The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is on the appeal of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. Mr. Chairman, I would not trespass upon the patience of the committee but for the fact that distinguished gentlemen on the other side of the House have taken upon this appeal anomalous positions, which in my judgment are without foundation in reason or in a fair construction of the rule, and are calculated, on account of the parliamentary ability of the gentlemen who have taken those positions, to mislead the judgment of the Committee of the Whole in its action.

The rule, I submit, was adopted for the purpose, as stated, of limiting the action of the Committee on Appropriations as well as the Committee of the Whole in any attempt to change existing law, and was designed to restrict such changes in accordance with the conditions expressed in the rule.

Now the provision of the bill under consideration does not attempt any such change of existing law; but this question arises upon the amendment submitted, which does seek to change existing law, and it is to this question that the attention of the committee is directed.

I submit that amendments proceed in one of three modes: either by a motion to strike out, or by a motion to insert, or by a motion both to strike out and insert.

Under the common parliamentary rule all amendments are admissible whether they are cognate to the proposition under discussion or not. Under this special rule an amendment is only admissible when it is cognate to the proposition. Under the common parliamentary law a motion to strike out and insert is divisible, but the first must be put before the other. But under the special rules of this House that common parliamentary rule has been abandoned, the House declaring by its rules that it shall be indivisible.

The first question to be determined is, is the amendment germane? How are you to ascertain that fact? What is the amendment? It is the entire proposition to strike out and insert. Simply to strike out would place you in the position stated by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER]. This proposition of the bill is simply an endeavor of the Committee on Appropriations to meet the condition of existing law providing for these civil Indian inspectors and their pay at so much per year. The amendment seeks to change existing law and at the same time strike out the appropriation. The motion to strike out, if it were divisible from the other, would have no effect, simply because the law would still stand and a deficiency bill would have to be reported to meet the provision of the law. On the other hand, the proposition contained in a portion of the amendment to insert would not meet the change of law if it stood alone, because it does not retrench expenditure.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] have stated that, if the ruling of the Chair is correct, then you may strike out any proposition in an appropriation bill and insert any other proposition, cognate or otherwise. I deny that under the very limitation of the rule, which declares it to be the duty of the Chair to determine whether the proposition is germane. That of itself is a complete answer to that proposition of those gentlemen.

Suppose a gentleman in moving to strike out this provision of the bill should attempt to change the Revised Statutes of the United States, would that be cognate to the proposition under discussion? Would it be cognate to the amendment? Not at all, and the Chair would rule the whole proposition out as not germane, because it must be germane as a whole. The proposition to change existing law here is cognate to the proposition in the bill. Why? Because by the motion to strike out you retrench expenditure, while the portion to insert changes existing law.

Mr. REED. It has got to be done in one time and one motion.

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask the gentleman from Maryland to yield to me for a question and to make a suggestion.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. Certainly.

Mr. HISCOCK. Part of the proposed amendment transfers a part of the duties confided to the Interior Department away from that Department and gives them to the War Department. Will the gentleman from Maryland tell me what distinction he would make between this proposition and a proposition to transfer the whole Indian Bureau from the Interior Department to the War Department? In the matter of principle and under the construction of this rule, how can the gentleman draw any distinction between the transfer of a part and the transfer of the whole Indian Bureau to the War Department?

Mr. HOBLITZELL. This amendment does not propose to transfer the Indian Bureau or any part of it from the Interior Department to the War Department. That is the way in which I understand the proposed amendment. As it has been perfected by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS], it provides that the officers of the Army who shall be detailed and designated for the performance of the duties of Indian inspectors, now discharged by civil employés, shall remain and be under the control of the Interior Department. The case therefore is not analogous to the one stated by the gentleman from New York.

Now, the motion to strike out and insert being indivisible in every case, it is the duty of the Chair first to pass upon the question whether it is germane or not. It can not be germane if the proposition to insert is not cognate to the proposition it strikes out. Therefore this is within the provision of the rule, and the ruling of the Chair must be held to be the correct one.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOBLITZELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. Would you consider a proposition to insert this without the provision to strike out as admissible?

Mr. HOBLITZELL. Of course not.

Mr. REED. Why?

Mr. HOBLITZELL. Because then it would not come within the provision of the rule.

Mr. REED. That answers the whole business.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. It would not be admissible for the simple reason that it is an attempt under a motion permitted by general parliamentary law to amend a bill in a way not within the meaning of the special rule of the House.

Mr. REED. If the gentleman will permit me I would ask, do you think that an inadmissible proposition can be dragged in by annexing it to an admissible one? In other words, does a good proposition make good a bad one or does a bad one make bad the whole proposition and vitiate the whole thing? Now, that is exactly the ground on which this stands.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. Not exactly.

Mr. REED. It is the identical question here.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. That is like the construction the gentleman gave on yesterday in the consideration of this question and in construing the rule by using this language, saying it should be read in this way:

"Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment"—
Now take out the unnecessary words—
"Nor shall any provision in any * * * amendment thereto, changing existing law, be in order," &c.

Mr. REED. That is correct.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. I say that question is just like the statement the gentleman made of the case. Now, Mr. Chairman, we are working under a special rule of this House. The general rule or the rule that governs parliamentary bodies and the common rule of parliamentary law would permit just the very thing that the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Maine state in taking the position that they are taking on this question, and that is to break down the provision of the rule which says that the proposition to strike out and insert is indivisible.

Mr. REED. The gentleman will permit me to say that there is nothing in that.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. The gentleman from Maine knows full well that any amendment under the common parliamentary law may be offered, whether germane or not, and it is admissible for consideration. Whether it shall be accepted or not is a question for the determination of the House. But in this Committee of the Whole, under the special rule or the general rules adopted for its guidance, the duty devolves upon the Chair to determine whether a proposition is germane or not, and being germane, whether it retrenches expenditure. That duty has been exercised by the Chair, who has held that it is germane, because under section 7 of Rule XVI a motion to strike out and insert is indivisible. Otherwise what would be the use of the motion to strike out and insert and the rule declaring it to be an indivisible proposition, and still when you come into the House you say that it is divisible and that the rule shall not operate?

Mr. REED. The gentleman must see that that is only one way of putting the question to the House.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. What did the gentleman say?

Mr. REED. That the question of dividing the proposition is only one way of putting it to the House; that is all.

Mr. VALENTINE. Let me ask the gentleman from Maryland, do you hold the proposition to impose this duty now performed by civilian inspectors upon Army officers to be germane to the subject-matter of this bill simply because it is annexed to a motion to strike out?

Mr. HOBLITZELL. The motion to strike out and insert is admissible, and is admissible as one indivisible proposition; for the reason, in the first place, that the motion to strike out does retrench expenditures; and secondly, the motion to insert does change existing law and it is cognate to the matter under discussion.

Mr. VALENTINE. Then all that is necessary to make any amendment germane to the subject-matter, according to the construction the gentleman from Maryland gives it, is to first retrench expenditures—strike out "ten" and insert "five"—and then add to it something else, so as to make the proposition indivisible.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. No, sir; it can not be germane unless it is cognate to the proposition.

Mr. VALENTINE. But according to your construction it may be cognate if coupled with a proposition which would not in itself be admissible. Now, the proposition standing alone without the motion to strike out would not be germane.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. The gentleman will understand me to argue of course that you can not segregate the motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Chairman, this presents an important question to the committee. It is very important that the rules shall be administered uniformly and correctly. Therefore no person who is temporarily in the chair should have any pride of opinion with reference to a decision of any question of order; and the only question to be determined is, what is the proper construction to be given to the rules? Now, I will state one or two facts, or call the attention of the committee to them, before proceeding to the discussion of the point of order that is now to be determined. Prior to the Forty-sixth Congress there had been a rule adopted which was formulated and introduced by my colleague. In the Forty-fifth Congress it was found that much legislation was often put upon appropriation bills, which led to very great difficulty. When the rules were codified in the Forty-sixth Congress the rule now under discussion was somewhat modified by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON], and a substitute offered by him was adopted, after long debate, in place of the rule as it had been previously adopted. The true construction of that rule gave rise to much discussion. It was comparatively new. The House had not operated under it nor had the committee.

Mr. Robinson, of Massachusetts, then a member of the House, presented an amendment, which materially reduced the amount upon the face of the bill and then added a proviso not connected with that reduction; and the then presiding officer, who is now the Speaker of this House, stated he was in doubt as to whether the provision as offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts was in order, but he would overrule the point of order for the purpose of having the committee determine the point. I have that decision before me. I will not stop to read it.

At that time, however, the committee was satisfied with the decision of the Chair and no appeal was taken; so that the first construction that this rule had was from the present Speaker of the House, procured by the gentleman from Massachusetts, who had offered a proposition by which he proposed to reduce and did reduce by his amendment the amount carried by the bill, but added a proviso to it immediately not connected with that reduction.

This took place in the Forty-sixth Congress. In the Forty-seventh Congress—it is true the political complexion of the House had changed, but that made no difference about the administration of the rule, because the rule is to be administered by all parties the same way or ought to be—in the Forty-seventh Congress the question arose again, first, I believe, on the Post-Office appropriation bill. A point of order was immediately made—and I have the decision before me—the point of order was immediately made that the amendment was obnoxious to the rule, for the reason that upon its face it did not retrench expenditures and that the portion of the amendment reducing the amount was made simply for the purpose of getting another substantive proposition before the House. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] criticised very harshly the ruling of the Chair. I have before me the debate that took place. The Chair then remarked that he was following the decisions of Mr. CARLISLE and Mr. CONVERSE, which were precisely in point, but that whenever the point was made against any substantive proposition he reserved the right to rule upon that point when it came up.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him simply to call his attention to the point that in each of those cases the substantive proposition offered was not an execution of the original purpose intended to be carried out, while this is intended to carry out the very object of the original proposition?

Mr. CALKINS. I will come to that in a moment.

I have those decisions before me and the debates that took place. Subsequently on the Post-Office appropriation bill in the Forty-seventh Congress, while the same gentleman was presiding, it was moved by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] to reduce the amount of money carried under a certain clause in that bill and add:

Provided, That it shall not be lawful for any contractor hereafter to sublet his contract, but he shall be required to fulfill the same according to law.

The amount that was carried by that clause of the bill was reduced in the amendment and this proviso followed. Mr. Robinson, of Massachusetts, made the point of order not against the whole amendment but against that clause of it which changed existing law, although it was germane to the proposition—and this answers my friend from Texas [Mr. REAGAN]—it was germane to the very proposition then under consideration and for which the amount to be appropriated had been reduced, which brings it precisely within the point here being discussed. Mr. Robinson made the point of order. After a very careful consideration the Chair made the following decision, which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that this is the first time, so far as he has been able to learn, that the precise point of order made by the gentleman from Massachusetts has been made. Points of order going to the entire amendment have been made in the last Congress and in the present during the consideration of this bill, but the precise point now raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts has never before been made under the rule since it was amended. When the Chair decided a point of order raised upon an amendment reducing the amount covered by this bill an appeal was taken from the decision, as members will recollect, upon the point that where the amount was reduced for the purpose simply of attaching to the reduction a new substantive proposition not necessarily connected with it, it was not within the purview of the rule. The Chair, upon the point as then presented, maintained the same doctrine held by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] and others when occupying the chair in Committee of the Whole in the last Congress.

The Chair now holds that a point of order against a substantive provision which upon its face has no relation to the amount which is reduced in another substantive proposition is well taken. In this case the amendment embraces two propositions. One is to reduce the amount covered by the bill. To that substantive proposition a point of order will not lie because it is within the rule. But as the second proposition—that "it shall not be lawful for any contractor hereafter to sublet his contract, but he shall be required to fulfill the same according to law"—is not a necessary part of the reduction of the amount covered by the bill, a point of order will lie against it.

Mr. CALKINS. That was the first decision made under this rule. It was followed through the Forty-seventh Congress and has so far been followed by every chairman who has occupied the chair in this Congress. And here is another decision by Mr. KASSON, of Iowa, when occupying the chair in the Committee of the Whole in pursuance of that decision.

Mr. REAGAN. I would suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that it is impossible to know what that means unless he lets the precise amendment be read on which the ruling was given.

Mr. CALKINS. I can state it quicker than it can be read. The proposition was to strike out a certain amount in a clause or to reduce the amount and then add a proviso that no contractor should sublet his contract.

Mr. REAGAN. That still leaves it uncertain as to whether the second part of the amendment was executive of the original proposition.

Mr. CALKINS. It was connected with it and was germane, but was a change of existing law, just as I shall claim this is. I think further on the gentleman from Texas will be satisfied by my remarks without taking up the time now further in reading. I ask the Clerk to read the paragraph which I have marked of the decision of the chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman fails to observe the language of the rule, namely: It must be an effect of the amendment objected to that reduces the amount covered by the bill; for otherwise any amendment would be in order when you added to it a reduction of $1 as an independent clause, and there would be no distinction between the proposition of the proviso and the proposition in the main body of the rule. It is not enough that some part of the amendment retrenches expenditure in a general way. The new legislation must do it in a special way. The Chair will keep close to the rule, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. CALKINS. Now, Mr. Chairman, on that point observe the language of the rule:

Nor shall any provision—

That is, a substantive provision, a provision containing a single point which when stripped from everything else is something substantive—

Says this rule—

in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order—

It does not stop there. It goes on "except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures," &c. What shall retrench expenditures? The "provision in any such bill or amendment" must of itself retrench expenditures; the part of the provision, a substantive proposition itself, must reduce expenditures, or else it is obnoxious to this rule if it changes existing law.

That brings me to the proposition before the committee, which is, first, to strike out a clause in this bill and thereby get rid of certain officers. That will reduce the amount carried by the bill, because it abolishes certain offices and therefore abolishes their salaries. Against that as a substantive proposition no point of order will lie. Why? Because it is within the rule; it abolishes the offices, it abolishes salaries, and thereby retrenches expenditures.

Then what do you come to? You come then to a substantive proposition to substitute in lieu and place of the clause stricken out, of the persons provided for in that clause, other persons; that is a substantive proposition. What does that do? It changes existing law. Does it retrench expenditures on its face? No; alone it does not retrench expenditures one dollar or one cent.

Mr. REAGAN. I would inquire of the gentleman what he does with clause 7 of Rule XVI, which prohibits the division of an amendment?

Mr. CALKINS. I will speak to that, for I may as well speak of it here as at any time. We have two rules, both for a purpose. The one rule says that a motion to strike out and insert is not divisible. I agree to that. But there is another rule, which says that, in reference to a certain class of appropriation bills, no new legislation changing existing law shall be in order, no "provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law shall be in order." You do not divide the amendment; you simply launch against a provision of it a point of order, and the Chair is to say whether that provision of the amendment, standing alone, is in order under the rule. That is the proposition. There is no division of the amendment; you do not divide it at all.

The rule which provides that no proposition to strike out and insert shall be divisible simply means that you can not call for separate votes, one upon the motion to strike out and another on the motion to insert. That is what it means. It means that you can not call for a separate vote upon the two propositions contained in the amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. That answers the whole of the gentleman's argument, if you can not call for a division on the vote.

Mr. CALKINS. You can not have the amendment divided on the vote. But when you come to construe that rule with the clause in the other rule, providing that no appropriation bill or amendment thereto shall contain a provision changing existing law unless that provision of itself retrenches expenditures, then you can launch a point of order against it without having it divisible. The question for the Chair to decide is, Does that proposition come within the rule? That is what the Committee of the Whole must determine; whether the proposition comes within the rule.

What does this amendment propose? It proposes, first, to strike out the clause providing for five Indian inspectors. That is all right; no point of order can lie against that. What else does it do? It proposes to change existing law; it proposes to put in something in place of existing law. What is that?

It simply proposes to tear from the statute-book a section of the law, and under refuge of an appropriation bill to make an amendment to the law and change existing law. Now, if you leave this door open your rule is gone, just as was said when the chairman of the Committee of the Whole made his decision in the Forty-sixth Congress; just as was said by the gentleman from Illinois; you can revise the whole Revised Statutes under such a construction of the rule as that.

Now, a further point. If the point which seems to be insisted upon by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] should prevail, you will then lose the whole benefit of this rule. There must be some time and place where a point of order can be made against any and every substantive proposition in a bill or amendment. If you can take refuge under the two rules as they seem to be construed by my friend from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], and introduce an amendment containing two or more propositions, and say that one rule is not applicable to them because another rule says the proposition shall not be divided, that the one rule shuts off the other, then there is no time at which a point of order may be launched against any single substantive proposition in any amendment. After it has been voted into the bill, of course no point of order will lie against it. And the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] says no point of order can be made upon it before it is voted in because the rule says it can not be divided. So the rule catches the House up, and gives no opportunity for a point of order to be made at any time against such a substantive proposition.

What is the question here? It seems to me to be in a nutshell. First, we have the motion to strike out. Is that a substantive proposition of itself? Nobody disputes that. As a substantive proposition it is in order, for the committee can at any time strike out a provision of the bill containing an appropriation for the salaries of officers.

Then there is a second proposition, to substitute in place of that which is to be stricken out another proposition. What does that other proposition do? It proposes to change existing law; all admit that. Is it obnoxious to the rule? The rule says that you shall not by any provision in an amendment or appropriation bill change existing law except by retrenching expenditures. But the gentleman from Texas says that it is simply to supply the vacuum made by striking out the clause in the bill, and therefore it connects itself with the bill. That is the very thing which the rule was made to prevent.

I think, Mr. Chairman, I have said all that I need to say on this question.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to enter into a discussion of the subtleties of the point of order. I propose to address myself to a statement of facts in reference to this matter. This is of course an entirely different proposition from the transfer of the Indian Bureau to the War Department. It simply proposes that certain officers shall be assigned to the performance of certain duties; it adds no new duties to those now belonging to officers of the Army.

It will be remembered that some years ago there was great scandal in the country in regard to the manner in which supplies were delivered to the Indians. We were told, for instance, that when ten sacks of flour were delivered for the use of the Indians receipts were given for a hundred; that when a few cattle were delivered at a corral, the herd was driven around three or four times, and receipts given for three or four times as many cattle as were actually delivered.

In order to put an end to the scandal and correct abuses of this kind, an order was made which is now in force and has been ever since that time, that no distribution of annuity supplies should be made unless the supplies were inspected and their distribution witnessed by an Army officer. That order has been and is to-day carried out. The abuses have been reformed. The delivery of supplies for the Indians is now regularly witnessed and certified to by an Army officer under the direction of the Secretary of War without any mandatory provision.

The present amendment simply provides, in the same direction, that the general inspection of the books of the agencies and their whole conduct shall be made by Army officers. It assigns to these officers no duties different from those already performed by them under the law. It does not transfer the Indian Bureau to the War Department.

Mr. CANNON. Then, if the amendment is not a change of law, what necessity is there for its adoption?

Mr. MAGINNIS. Because it is a good thing. It ought to be agreed upon in this House by unanimous consent. I am sorry that a point of order has been raised against a provision so well adapted to promote the efficiency of the Indian service.

Mr. ELLIS. I move that the committee now rise for the purpose of closing debate.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope the gentleman will withhold that motion for a moment.

Mr. ELLIS. Very well; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, if the proposition made by the gentleman from Illinois and other gentlemen on that side of the House be true, then under the rules no amendment can be received which does not simply strike out. Under the construction which they lay down, you can offer no amendment which strikes out one thing and inserts another.

The point of difference in regard to this proposition I understand to be this: the object of the provision in the bill is to provide for inspections by five officers who are to be paid under the bill at the rate of $2,500 a year each, making $12,500. The amendment proposes simply, not to change the existing law but to execute it by a different agency already provided by law.

Mr. CALKINS. My friend falls into an error. When you strike out the provision which it is proposed to strike out there can be no execution of the present law; that law is gone; you simply provide a new law.

Mr. REAGAN. Gentlemen have all the time ignored clause 7 of Rule XVI. They insist that this proposition embraces two amendments, when in fact, under our rules, as has been well explained by the gentleman from Maryland, it is but one amendment, and by virtue of a special rule, modifying the ordinary parliamentary law, is indivisible.

There can be no question that the whole amendment taken together reduces expenditures to the amount of $12,500 and does not change existing law, except to provide a different agency for doing the very thing now provided for by law.

The CHAIRMAN. It was stated yesterday by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] and possibly by other gentlemen who discussed this appeal that their remarks were designed, in part at least, to invite the Chair to review the decision he had made, with a view to securing a reversal of that decision by the Chair himself. Suggestions coming from such respectable sources the Chair could not decline to entertain. He has therefore re-examined the grounds of his decision as made yesterday. Inasmuch as this review of the question has not resulted in discovering to the Chair any error in the decision of yesterday, but on the contrary has brought added confidence in its correctness, the Chair desires to state briefly the reasons which constrain him to adhere to his ruling.

For the information of the Committee of the Whole the Clerk will report the amendment as first presented by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON] and then the amendment as subsequently modified upon the suggestion of the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS].

The Clerk read the original amendment, as follows:

Strike out lines 122, 123, and 124 and insert the following:

"That the Secretary of War shall detail five officers not under the grade of captain of the Army, who shall act as Indian inspectors. Said officers may be changed at any time the Secretary of War may deem proper."

The Clerk also read the amendment as subsequently modified, as follows:

Strike out lines 122, 123, and 124 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The office of Indian inspector is hereby abolished, and the Secretary of War shall detail five officers of the Army, not under the grade of captain, who shall act, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, as Indian inspectors; and the Secretary of War shall change such officers at any time the Secretary of the Interior shall request the same to be done."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now read that portion of the third clause of Rule XXI on which the point of order rests.

The Clerk read as follows:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no dispute about the fact that this proposed amendment changes existing law. It is therefore obnoxious to the clause of the rule just read, unless it possesses two requirements: First, it must be germane to the subject-matter of the bill; in the second place, it must retrench expenditures in one of the three ways pointed out in the rule; that is, "by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, or by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill."

With reference to the first of these requirements, that is, that the amendment must be germane to the subject-matter of the bill, the Chair finds on investigation that his decision of yesterday is unanswerably sustained by the precedent referred to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. That precedent so referred to was the ruling of Mr. Speaker Kerr on an original provision in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. In order that the committee may understand exactly what that ruling was, the Chair will have the Clerk read the provision on which that ruling was had.

The CHAIRMAN. Page 2820, April 28, 1876.

CONSTRUCTION OF RULE 120.

The following section upon which a point of order was raised in the committee and postponed for the decision of the House was then read:

"SEC. 4. That the management of all Indian affairs, and of all matters arising out of Indian relations, be, and the same is hereby, transferred from the Department of the Interior to the War Department, and the same is hereby placed under the Secretary of War, agreeably to such regulations as the President may prescribe: And provided further, That the office of Commissioner of Indian Affairs is hereby abolished, and the execution of all laws and parts of laws applicable to the management of Indian affairs and of matters arising out of Indian relations is hereby lodged with the Secretary of War: And provided further, That the duties now being intrusted to and performed by Indian agents and other officials and employés of every kind and description will be performed by officers, soldiers, and employés of the Army."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now read the decision of Mr. Speaker Kerr on the point of order made against that provision, that is on the point of order whether or not the provision which the Clerk has just read was germane to the subject-matter of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Much has been said on the question whether this fourth section is germane to the subject-matter of this bill. The subject-matter of the bill is indicated in its title, "A bill making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes." The purpose of the bill further is to regulate the salaries of officers, and in some cases to retrench expenditures by the abolition of officers, and necessarily of their salaries. In other words, in the judgment of the Chair the subject-matter of this bill is so comprehensive that it can not be said that a provision proposing in specific terms the abolition of numerous officers is not germane to a bill which regulates many offices and fixes the salaries thereto attached and abolishes other offices and their salaries. The Chair has to say, therefore, in conclusion on this point, that he is not embarrassed by the question whether or not this section is germane to the subject-matter of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has to remark in connection with that decision that the present case is much stronger than the case on which Mr. Speaker Kerr ruled, because the bill which contained the provision objected to was the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. It had no legislation in relation to the Indian service; it made no appropriation for the Indian service nor was there any reference whatever in the bill to the Indian service. And it was mainly on this ground that it was insisted that the provision was not germane to the bill.

General Garfield, who participated in the discussion of the point of order, thus presented this aspect of the question:

Now, on the score of its being germane, I invite the attention of the Speaker to a fact which he may not have considered. Suppose I had offered this transfer section as an amendment to the Post-Office appropriation bill, nobody would doubt that the Speaker would rule my amendment out of order on the ground that the Post-Office appropriation bill is not at all related to Indian affairs. But I call the attention of the Speaker to the fact that there is not one line, not one word in the whole bill, outside of the fourth section, that even names Indian affairs or that refers directly or indirectly to the Bureau of Indian Affairs. That subject is as clearly absent from this bill as though this were the Post-Office appropriation bill. There is no hook in this bill on which there can be hung a jurisdiction over this subject.

Yet even in that case, as we have just seen, Speaker Kerr said he had no embarrassment in holding that the provision objected to was germane. For a much stronger reason is the present amendment germane to the subject-matter of the present bill. The bill concerns directly and exclusively the Indian service and the amendment relates directly and exclusively to the same service. That the amendment is germane to the subject-matter of the bill the Chair thinks is a conclusion at once clearly dictated by reason and impregnably confirmed by authority.

Now in reference to the second requirement. Does the amendment retrench expenditures in either of the three ways pointed out in the rule?

The Chair will have the Clerk read the clause of the bill which the amendment proposes to strike out.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of five Indian inspectors, at $2,500 per annum each, $12,500.

The CHAIRMAN. If the amendment be agreed to, that clause is stricken out, and the Chair has no difficulty in holding that in that way retrenchment is effected by the "reduction of the amounts of money covered by the bill." Unquestionably the amendment strikes from the bill an item of $12,500.

But it is said, and on this point the Chair desires to be definitely understood, that the amendment involves two propositions, one being the proposition to strike out and the other being a proposition to insert; that the former proposition does retrench expenditure, while the latter does not. To that position the ready answer is that a motion to strike out and insert, under the rules of this House, is indivisible.

But it is said further that the matter—and that seems to be the point most strongly relied on by some gentlemen—that the matter which the amendment proposes to insert contains two distinct and independent propositions, that one of these propositions is obnoxious to the rule, and therefore the whole amendment is vitiated. And in support of this a ruling is cited, made during the last Congress. The Clerk will read the ruling.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Chair now holds that a point of order against a substantive provision which upon its face has no relation to the amount which is reduced in another substantive proposition is well taken. In this case the amendment embraces two propositions. One is to reduce the amount covered by the bill. To that substantive proposition a point of order will not lie because it is within the rule. But as the second proposition—that "it shall not be lawful for any contractor hereafter to sublet his contract, but he shall be required to fulfill the same according to law"—is not a necessary part of the reduction of the amount covered by the bill, a point of order will lie against it. The Chair holds that under the rule a point of order may be made against any substantive provision not directly connected with the amount covered by the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, the Chair thinks he is not in antagonism with this ruling, but concedes that if an amendment contains two independent substantive propositions, one of which retrenches expenditures, while the other does not, a point of order would be fatal to the whole amendment, at least until it is so perfected as to be cured of the vice.

Such, in the opinion of the Chair, is not the case with the present amendment.

What is the amendment? Simply this: It proposes to devolve on certain military officers duties now performed by five Indian inspectors, and thereafter the employment of these Indian inspectors shall cease and be determined. The chairman submits that these two clauses, the one which provides for devolving on certain military officers certain duties now performed by inspectors, and the other, which terminates the employment of these inspectors, are not independent substantive propositions, but are congruous and coherent parts of one proposition.

The Chair feels that he might go further and safely assert that one of these clauses, that which provides for the termination of the employment of the inspectors, is the necessary and inseparable incident to the other, which transfers the duties of the inspectors to the Army officers.

But to present the matter in yet another aspect: The proposition of the amendment is to carry on a particular and existing branch of the Indian service. Now, if the two clauses be separated, that is, if the clause which devolves upon Army officers the duties now performed by the inspectors be eliminated, the proposition of the amendment is destroyed, because the service is left altogether unprovided for. In any view which the Chair has been able to take of the question the two clauses are not independent and substantive propositions, but connected and necessary constituents of one proposition.

Being still of the opinion, therefore, that the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, while it changes existing law, is still germane to the subject-matter of the bill and does retrench expenditures in the way named, the Chair is constrained to adhere to his decision of yesterday, overruling the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois; and from this decision the gentleman from Illinois appeals to the committee.

The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question was taken.

Mr. CANNON. As this is an important question I shall ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman ask for a vote by tellers?

Mr. CANNON. No; a division will be all that is necessary.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 114, noes 14.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas who offered the amendment is recognized.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I do not care specially to occupy the floor upon the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let us have a vote.

Mr. KEIFER. Unless the gentleman from Texas desires to be heard first in support of his amendment, I wish to say that I am opposed to it. The proposition embodied in that amendment is one that can not, in my judgment, be worked out satisfactorily in practice. I am not prepared to say now that it would be bad policy, to say the least, to put the control of the whole Indian Department under the War Department and manage it through the officers of the Army. That is a question which is yet to be determined. But I do think it would be very anomalous to undertake to mix up the War Department and the Interior Department, as here proposed, in the control of the Indians.

By law there are five of these inspectors authorized to be appointed, whose duties place them under the control of the Interior Department, and specially under the direction of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. These five civil officers of the Government go wherever the Commissioner sends them for the purpose of looking into the management of the Indians, and are under his charge for that purpose. They examine and report upon the conduct of the Indian agents and the police that are employed by and under the Indian agents. These people give information and make special reports of their inspection. They have no well-defined duties, but are subject to the orders of the Interior Department. Now, it is proposed by this amendment to abolish this plan of appointing civil Indian inspectors, and impose the duties now performed by them upon certain officers of the Army, five in number, and to be of not less rank than that of captain.

This seems to me to be a very objectionable change. It is in the first place a very anomalous thing in our Government to require Army officers to report for duty to the Secretary of the Interior and be made subject to his orders and placed under his control. The officers of the Army have clearly defined duties, partly by law and largely by practice; and they are under the control of a given discipline as fixed in the Articles of War. What would govern them; what would control them while performing duties such as are performed by civilians under the direction and orders of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs or the Secretary of the Interior? Are these detached officers to be taken permanently from the control of the Secretary of War and that of the General of the Army, and put in the performance of duty for which they are not specially qualified; duties which they are not authorized or required to prepare themselves to fill? Or are they to be left to do those duties which are prescribed by law and the orders that they are to be subjected to? If the time shall come when the whole control of the Indian Department is to be placed under the Secretary of War, a harmonious scheme or plan of operations will no doubt be devised by which these Indian agencies would be controlled in a systematic and orderly manner. But here we undertake to encroach upon a policy that is working well; and it is a policy where we find no difficulty in getting along with these civilian officers against whom no charges can be made. No person has complained of any one of them. No charges have been made against these inspectors that they have failed to do their duty. The fact is that these five inspectors are selected because of their integrity and capacity to go forth and deal with questions which are presented to them.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Chairman, this is not a proposition to transfer the Indian service or any part of it to the care and keeping of the War Department. It does dispense with the services of these officers, Indian inspectors, and imposes the duties of these officers on other salaried officers of the Government with no other work to do.

One of the many things which I do not understand is the growth of expenditure, the increased cost of the Indian service. It seems to me the more we expend in preparing the Indians to take care of themselves the more we are required to pay annually for the cost of taking care of them.

In the time of Mr. Buchanan, whose administration all claim the right to abuse, our Indian service cost no less than $3,000,000. Fifteen years later, in 1875, it went up to more than $8,000,000. In 1878, after much complaint of extravagance, it got down again to less than five millions. In 1882 it went up again to over nine, nearly ten, millions of dollars.

There are no more Indians now than formerly; I believe only about 350,000 in all. In fact, we have a less number to treat with and care for than formerly. Now that we have expended great sums of money, and more land than money, in building railroads, in cheapening the means of reaching them, we certainly can feed them cheaper than we formerly could. We can fight them and kill them as cheaply as we ever could, and if we can not rob them at as little cost as we could twenty-five or more years ago, then people are greatly mistaken in the progress we have made in these later years in our Indian policy.

I have here a statement of the annual expenditure for the Indian service for the years from 1856 to 1883, inclusive. It is as follows:

Statement showing the net ordinary expenditures by fiscal years for the Indian service.

| 1856 | $2,769,429 55 | 1870 | $3,407,938 15 |

| 1862 | 2,273,223 45 | 1876 | 5,966,558 17 |
| 1863 | 3,154,357 11 | 1877 | 5,277,007 22 |
| 1864 | 2,629,858 77 | 1878 | 4,629,280 28 |
| 1865 | 5,116,837 08 | 1879 | 5,206,109 08 |
| 1866 | 3,247,064 56 | 1880 | 5,945,457 09 |
| 1867 | 4,642,531 77 | 1881 | 6,514,161 09 |

One other thing I want to say is, that just why the Indians should cost so much more than formerly is to me unexplained. After diligent inquiry I have never been able to find where the more than $9,000,000 which was expended in 1882 was appropriated, even including deficiencies. In fact, it seems that this subject of expenditure and appropriation is not an exact science after all. It is ever changing, and I fear often without good reason for the change.

I have here a very carefully prepared table or statement made by that exceedingly capable, conscientious, and to the public most useful man the former chairman of the Appropriations Committee, Hon. Mr. Atkins. It will show how appropriations rise and fall without any apparent public reason for such a difference of appropriations for years coming one after the other or following immediately one after the other. The difference in appropriations for 1883 and 1884 seems to be about $65,000,000. Deficiencies may account for part; but neither here nor elsewhere can I find any explanation or excuse for what seems to me to be growing into profligate expenditure in the Indian service.

[a] For new guns, and tests of same, for armament of seacoast fortifications.

[b] Two million three hundred thousand dollars is given for new steel cruisers (3), and for engines and machinery for the monitors. The Bureau of Construction and Repair is reduced $650,000, Steam-Engineering $600,000, and "pay of the Navy" about $100,000.

[c] Transportation by star-routes is reduced $2,000,000 and by steamboats $200,000. The other branches of the service are increased to the amount of this reduction, less the sum stated above.

[e] There is transferred from the Army to the legislative and sundry civil bills, on account of enlisted men acting as clerks and for the Signal Corps, about $842,000. Reductions are made as follows: Pay of the Army, $300,000; subsistence, $400,000; regular supplies, $560,000; incidental expenses, $261,000; transportation of the Army, $814,000; barracks and quarters, $180,000.

[f] This increase is principally on account of transfer from the Army bill of the amounts for enlisted men acting as clerks, &c., in the Departments.

[g] The appropriations for public buildings are reduced $1,888,700.

Mr. CANNON. I move to strike out the last word.

I can not reply to what my colleague [Mr. MORRISON] proposes to incorporate as a part of his remarks, a statement by a former chairman of the Committee on Appropriations as to the amounts of appropriations for the Indian service in former years. I may do so later, when it is printed in the RECORD and I have a chance to see it. What connection it has with this amendment I do not know, but I may find out when I read the RECORD to-morrow.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] says this is not a proposition to transfer the Indian Bureau to the War Department. I think that is true; but it is a proposition to transfer a part of the Army to the Indian Bureau. That is, you do not take Mahomet to the mountain, but you take the mountain to Mahomet.

I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. WAIT].

Mr. WAIT. I cannot permit this change to be made in the existing laws, which are intended to protect the rights of the Indian tribes, without entering my protest against the same. If I understand the proposition of the gentleman from Texas, it is to repeal that section of the law which gives to the Interior Department the appointment of five inspectors and to select five Army officers to discharge the duties which are now performed by the appointees who are taken from civil life. It is, in short, to remove from office a body of men who have been selected with great care by the Secretary of the Interior, under the advice of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, on account of their fitness for the place, who have had long training and valuable experience gained in the discharge of their official duties, and to substitute men who, though very likely able and accomplished military officers, have had no special experience in Indian affairs and no particular training that would qualify them to take the places of the present trained and experienced inspectors. It is, in short, to remove competent, efficient, and trained officials and to substitute for them men who have seen no service in the line of duties which these inspectors have discharged. What are the duties of these five inspectors? They pass from tribe to tribe under the orders of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, see that the provisions, clothing, and other articles which the Government provides for the Indian tribes are honestly furnished and equitably distributed, that members of the tribes are protected in their rights, that they enjoy the educational advantages that the Government is pledged to bestow upon them, and to report their condition to the Interior Department.

The gentleman now at the head of the Indian Bureau can be unhesitatingly trusted to discharge all the duties of his very important office with ability and fidelity. Every one who knows him can bear testimony to his great executive ability and unbending integrity. He has selected the present inspectors, and his large experience in Congress and at the head of the Indian Bureau eminently qualifies him to decide correctly what the interests and necessities of these tribes require and to select fit men who can properly discharge the responsible duties devolving on the inspectors. I can not entertain a doubt but that he has appointed those who by inquiry and examination he found qualified on the ground of personal fitness and business training to discharge the duties of this office. Some of them have been in the employ of the Department for years. The Commissioner knows just what work to assign to each man, just what special duty each man can best perform, and now to legislate these men out of places they have so well filled and to put military men, untrained in these duties, in their places would, I think, be an impolitic step for Congress to take, and unfortunate certainly for the Indian tribes.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that we are under every obligation to the Indians of this country to do everything in our power to protect, civilize, educate, and socially advance them. We should certainly aim to qualify them to enjoy the privileges and exercise the rights of citizenship. What few descendants of the old tribes that used to possess Connecticut still remain are recognized as citizens, enjoying their lands in severalty, many of them industrious men, as farmers, mechanics, or laborers, and are respected in the social positions which they fill. Their children mingle with the white children in our public schools, and many of the descendants of the old Mohican Indians are respected for their industry and moral worth.

Again I say, Mr. Chairman, that I hope that the pending amendment will not prevail; that the able head of the Indian Bureau will not be embarassed in the proper and efficient discharge of his duties by any change in his subordinates. I should certainly be earnestly opposed, as I have said before, to have untrained and inexperienced men substituted for those whose training and experience eminently qualify them for the proper discharge of the varied duties of the positions they now fill.

Mr. COX, of New York. In 1872 we had a very large range of discussion on the proposed transfer of the Indian Bureau to the War Department. There was a very thorough discussion at that time. I happened to take some part in it. Some of the best men of this House on both sides, and notably Professor Seelye, took the ground that it would be wise to keep the Indian Bureau where it was, under civil influence, and not allow the Army to control it. I believe, sir, we were wise at that time in turning the Indian Bureau over to the War Department, for there was not then the same class of officers in the Army and there was a disorganization on our border which the Army tended more or less to reduce to further chaos.

[h] A river and harbor bill appropriating $8,047,000 passed the House March 1, but failed of consideration in the Senate.

[i] This difference includes the following, charged as deficiencies on account of the fiscal year 1882, namely: Pensions, $16,000,000; postal service, $3,266,639.61; naval service, $425,000; Indian service, $1,036,000; public printing, $865,000; Tenth Census, $620,000. Except the sum for the postal service, these items may be called additional rather than "deficiency appropriations."

But this amendment now offered by the intelligent gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON] does not propose to transfer the Indian Bureau to the War Department. It simply says, "Let us try an experiment in one locality, with five good soldiers, not below the rank of captain, to be inspectors." Inspectors of what? Inspectors of the supplies to be furnished to the Indians; inspectors of the agents who are appointed, sometimes very recklessly, and who after one or two years' service are found to be not the best or wisest choice.

Why should not these supplies furnished the Indians be inspected? Perhaps the worst thing that has happened to the Indian service has been the corruption attending the supplies furnished the Indians. In fact, many of the wars on our borders came from the manner in which contractors have fulfilled their contracts to furnish supplies to the Indians, and they have been called "contractors' wars."

Why is it, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] well put it a moment ago—I mean the distinguished gentleman who is not giving me any attention as I speak [laughter]—why is it that the gentleman is making an outcry for information, and wants to know why it is that our Indian affairs are costing us so much more than they used to cost, running $300,000 a year, when he and I first came to Congress, up to seven or eight millions a year now? It is because we do not pursue toward the Indians the practice and conduct which characterizes the Canadian system.

In 1872 I had information from Lord Dufferin himself, then governor-general of the Dominion, to the effect that in Canada it cost only $2.35 per capita to care for the 87,000 Indians there, while in the United States, with 300,000 Indians scattered over 200,000 square miles, it costs $60 per capita. Why does it cost more here? Because we have not cared for the Indian properly.

In Canada they make the Indian an integral part of the empire; they give him citizenship; they give him land in severalty I believe; they pay him annuities according to their treaties, and pay him, too, in the right kind of money, such as an Indian can appreciate. They try to lift him up, not to put him under the army, but to make him police his own soil, to make him his own soldier, a part of the government. Therefore he stands higher there than the great body of Indians do in our own country.

Mr. BELFORD. I am always delighted to hear any remarks that are made by my most affectionate friend from the State of New York [Mr. COX]. He has never been encompassed and surrounded by these Indian troubles, and therefore he talks most vigorously against the proposition pending before the committee.

Mr. COX, of New York. I belong to Tammany. [Laughter].

Mr. BELFORD. "Belong to Tammany!" I will say for his benefit that the Tammany tribe has been the worst we have ever had in the politics of this country. [Great laughter.]

Mr. COX, of New York. It has not cost you anything.

Mr. BELFORD. What is this proposition? Are you Democrats never going to learn any sense [laughter] or acquire any information in the very front, as Shakespeare says, "the very forefront and presence" of a Presidential election? You cut down the naval appropriation bill, as I said the other day, $8,000,000. You cut down the Post-Office appropriation bill $4,000,000. You have cut down this appropriation bill over $4,000,000. I suppose that you are all going to float out before the county on the sweet and aromatic wave of economy.

What are we required to do in the government of these Indians? Control them by the Army. We have got to subdue their outbreaks with the Army. The officers of the Army are honorable men in every respect, and we should trust them in preference to the appointment of Indian agents who go there for the sole purpose of speculation, advancement, and profit.

Mr. COX, of New York. I am on your side in that.

Mr. BELFORD. We men who live in the West, who have encountered the ravages and the devastations and the murders and the desolations of these wild tribes, know just exactly what our requirements demand of us. I am therefore in favor of subduing these Indian tribes by the strong military force of this Government.

What have we been doing for years but supporting a class of idle paupers? Yes, I say it advisedly, "idle paupers," who will not work. I say that a man who will not work, whether he is an Indian or a white man, should starve. That is my theory of the Indian question.

If we are going to appropriate every year millions of money for the support of an idle, vagrant, malevolent, malicious race, then let us go to work and take on our hands all the paupers of the United States. Who can tell us where a distinction should exist between the white pauper who can not obtain employment and the Indian who will not work? I would like to have some man tell me——

Mr. BRENTS. Will my friend——

Mr. BELFORD. Just wait a minute. I would like to have some gentleman on the floor of this House tell me upon what basis—— [The chairman raised his gavel.] Keep that gavel up a minute, Mr. Chairman. [Laughter.] I would like to have some gentleman tell me upon what basis the distinction rests. We vote millions to support Indian paupers, and would not vote a dollar to support a white man. Now, Mr. Chairman, let it drop. [Laughter.]

Mr. KASSON. I should like to tell my friend from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] one distinction between an Indian pauper and a white one. As everybody knows, we have taken the lands of the Indians and given them to the whites to prevent the whites from becoming paupers. So long as the Indian civilization, which was as distinct and peculiar as ours, continued the Indians supported themselves. They not only asked no help from the white man but they asked the white man to keep away from them. My own State, fair and beautiful, supporting nearly two millions of people, furnished ample support for the old Sac and Fox tribes that inhabited it and controlled nearly the whole of it. But we forced them away to take up their abode where their mode of livelihood could not be by hunting.

But I can not go into that question; there is no time. I only wish to say that a moral obligation rests upon the United States to change by proper and humane methods the system by which the Indians formerly lived, a system of which we deprived them, into the system of the white man which we are urging upon them.

Now, coming to this distinct proposition, my objection to it does not rest upon the question whether it might or might not be advantageous to introduce military control into the government of the Indian tribes. A measure which I introduced in a former Congress, the Thirty-ninth, and which, having been earnestly advocated by me, passed this House, if I remember correctly, by a majority of four votes, but was defeated in the Senate, was perhaps the first proposition made here to transfer the Indian Bureau to the control of the War Department.

Hence I have no prejudices upon this subject. In my opposition to this particular amendment I speak to gentlemen on both sides of the House from another point of view. When this House voted in favor of changing the relation of the Indian Bureau from the Interior Department to the War Department that was believed to be the only mode of curing the evils of administration which then prevailed. Those evils have ceased to exist. No one is complaining now of general dishonesty or corruption in the administration of our Indian laws or in the purchase and distribution of supplies. Those matters are no more liable to abuse than the purchase of supplies for the War Department itself. Therefore, in the present condition of things, we gain nothing so far as I can see in honesty or in safety of administration by making this partial transfer of Indian management to officers of the Army.

On the other hand, do we not lose something? I submit to the judgment of the committee that we do. We have now as inspectors five experienced men, whose politics are not even known to us, who have no relation to anything except the just and humane administration of the Indian laws. I do not personally know one of them; I only know that they are approved by all men of all parties interested in Indian civilization.

Now, I say to my friend from Montana, we can not and ought not to make this a question of the mere inspection of supplies, a duty which of course an Army officer can discharge as well as a civilian, perhaps better. But these men are detailed for other and greater uses. They inspect the schools; they inspect the progress of the new system of Indian civilization. They must be men who have a heart in the work, who are in accord with the feeling of this House and of the country on this subject. What assurance have we that military officers will carry on this work to the same extent that civil officers do? We have none.

I think, sir, that a measure of this kind should certainly not be adopted until the Committee on Indian Affairs, having proper jurisdiction of these subjects, recommends the measure. The Appropriations Committee has not asked it; the Committee on Indian Affairs has not asked it. We are requested to make this change in the present system upon individual motion simply, without examination by the proper committees and without recommendation from persons directly charged with Indian administration. I do not think we ought to do it, and I hope it will not be done.

Mr. ELLIS. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] withdraw his motion?

Mr. ELLIS. I do so if we can have a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. May I ask the gentleman from Louisiana or the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS] to state all the duties of an Indian inspector. I do not know what they are, and I wish to find out.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I will state them. While the Secretary of the Interior has the general control of the Indian Bureau, its administration is immediately under the control of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. These inspectors were provided for some years ago in an appropriation bill such as we have now under discussion, there being at that time abuses in the Indian Bureau. These inspectors are not amenable to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. They are appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, and are his officers, their duty being to investigate the agencies, to examine the accounts of agents, to inspect the schools, to make general report on the conduct of the agents and the efficiency of administration at the different agencies. They are not, as has been stated, men of very great experience, trained to this work. I venture to say that of the five Indian inspectors now in the service of the Government there is not one whose commission is three years old. I do not think there is one whose commission is two years old. These officers are changed just as any other political officers are changed, by political pressure; they are appointed by political patronage.

Mr. KASSON. No, sir.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. What I wanted was simply an enumeration of their duties.

Mr. MAGINNIS. If the argument in regard to training and experience is worth anything it is all in favor of the amendment, because these Army officers are trained to perform the very class of duties now devolving upon these inspectors. As to the objection that we propose to put a new duty upon these Army officers, that will not stand. Already Army officers are being detailed to inspect the supplies and annuities delivered at these agencies to these Indians. They are detailed as these officers would be. There is not a single distribution made at any of these agencies to any of these Indian tribes which has not been inspected and certified to by an Army officer under the control and direction of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior, just as it is proposed in this case. Instead of an invasion it is to perfect the system.

Mr. ELLIS. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate.

Mr. COX, of New York. I desire to make a correction.

Mr. ELLIS. How long?

Mr. COX, of New York. One minute. I suppose I can do it in my own right.

Mr. ELLIS. No; but I will withdraw the motion to rise and yield to the gentleman from New York for one minute.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a correction. When up awhile ago I did not state the figures of the expenses of the Indian service with exactness. When I first came to Congress in 1856 it was $2,769,429.55. It ran along, being a little more or a little less than $2,000,000, until after the war. In 1865 it ran up to $5,000,000. In 1866 it was between three and four millions; in 1871 it rose to $7,426,997; in 1872 it was $7,061,728; in 1873, $6,692,000; and in 1874, $8,384,656. In 1876 it was $5,996,000. Mark the time when it dropped from eight to five millions. It was when the matter was administered by the party of economy. Every time the Democracy came into power this expense was lessened, to the great disgust of my friend from Iowa [Mr. KASSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. KASSON. I think I should reply for one minute after that.

Mr. ELLIS. I will yield for one minute.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman will observe it arises from the process by which the Indians were reduced from wild barbarism to civilization. And under it we had no Seminole war, costing from $20,000,000 to $30,000,000 in money. It was expended for processes of civilization and under treaty stipulations.

Mr. COX, of New York. You had Modoc, Cheyenne, and a half-dozen other Indian wars besides, and they were nearly all contractors' wars.

Mr. KASSON. Not at all.

Mr. ELLIS. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate on this paragraph.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WELLBORN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6092) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. ELLIS. I move that debate on the pending paragraph of the Indian appropriation bill and all amendments thereto be closed in thirty seconds.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will give enough time to answer the reasonable questions I asked a few minutes ago. I have listened to every speaker, following every word, simply for information, and I have not got it yet.

Mr. ELLIS. I will make it five minutes and give it all to the gentleman from Illinois.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ELLIS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. WELLBORN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee resumes the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill, and by order of the House all debate on the pending paragraph is limited to five minutes.

Mr. ELLIS. I will yield it all to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I will employ the time yielded to me by the gentleman from Louisiana by repeating the request which I have already made, for information as to the duties of these Indian inspectors under existing law, and I shall yield the floor to any gentleman who will be kind enough to enumerate their duties.

Mr. ELLIS. I have not the statutes before me, but in general, as the gentleman will find on an examination of the statutes, this board of inspection is constituted for the purpose of traveling about among the different Indian agencies and making a general inspection of the Indian service. They inspect the accounts of the Indian agents, the schools, the provisions or other articles furnished by contractors and sent there, such as beef cattle, flour, &c., and make reports of their examination to the Interior Department. That, I believe, includes the general substance of their duties.

Mr. KEIFER. And to inquire about the condition of the Indians generally.

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, sir; everything pertaining to them and their condition.

Mr. PERKINS. And there are but five of these agents to perform this service for the entire Government?

Mr. ELLIS. That is all.

Mr. MILLIKEN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I will yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Suppose these five Army officers that you propose to assign to this duty shall be called into active service, who then performs the duty of inspection?

Mr. ELLIS. I suppose the duty will be left unperformed until their places are filled.

Mr. REAGAN. The four hundred supernumerary Army officers could certainly furnish enough for that service.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. If there is any gentleman who thinks the statement as to the duties of these Indian inspectors is incomplete, I shall be glad to yield the floor to him to answer further the question I have asked.

Mr. ELLIS. The gentleman from Illinois will find that the statement I have given covers about the substance of the statute defining their duties.

Mr. GEORGE. I would like to add that the inspectors of the Secretary of the Interior occupy about the same relations with him in regard to the Indian agencies and their affairs as the post-office inspectors do in regard to the postal matters and the general business of the postal service to the Postmaster-General.

Mr. PERKINS. And they had just as well assign the duty of inspecting the post-offices and other business connected therewith to Army officers as these Indian agencies?

Mr. GEORGE. Just as well devolve that duty upon Army officers as this.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. That is a matter of argument, and I only ask for information. I will not detain the committee any longer.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 69, noes 54.

Mr. KEIFER. Tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. As many as are in favor of taking this vote by tellers——

Mr. KEIFER. No quorum has voted.

Mr. HOLMAN. The point of order is made too late.

Mr. KEIFER. But tellers are always ordered when there is no quorum.

Mr. HOLMAN. When that point is made.

Mr. KEIFER. The result of the vote had not been announced.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will order tellers.

Mr. KEIFER and Mr. THROCKMORTON were appointed tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 91, noes 67.

So (no further count being demanded) the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I would suggest to the gentleman in charge of this bill whether there ought not to be added to the amendment just adopted the words:

Or when required for other service under the direction of the Secretary of War.

In other words, the amendment as it stands requires him to make this change at the request of the Secretary of the Interior. But in case the Secretary of War wants one of these officers for general service it leaves it open to doubt as to whether some provision should not be made to meet that case.

Mr. MAGINNIS. The regulations would cover that.

Mr. KASSON. It provides that he shall have the right to change at the request of the Secretary of the Interior; but, as I say, the question is open to doubt——

Mr. MAGINNIS. I think that under the general regulations of the Army he would have the right to change him anyway.

Mr. ELLIS. I do not object; but I think it is provided for already in the general regulations.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For necessary traveling expenses of five Indian inspectors, including incidental expenses of inspection and investigation, $5,000.

Mr. ELLIS. I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk, by instruction of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out of lines 125 and 126 the words "Indian inspectors," and in lieu thereof insert the words "Army officers detailed as Indian inspectors."

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me inquire whether when these Army officers are simply detailed, as they will be here, they will not be on detached service, and of course receive mileage also under the appropriation made for the military service?

Mr. MAGINNIS. Not in this case.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me that they would.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I think the usual practice is to pay their expenses when under the service of the Interior Department. We have now detailed officers performing the service of making inspections, and their expenses are paid.

Mr. ELLIS. The expense is incurred in the Indian service, and the Indian appropriation bill ought to cover the amount necessary to meet it.

Mr. HOLMAN. It should be provided for, of course, unless it is paid elsewhere. But if the same provision is made in the Army bill they may be paid twice.

Mr. ELLIS. It ought to be in this bill.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add the following proviso:
"Provided, No payment shall be made to such Army officers for traveling expenses in this service except as provided in this bill."

Mr. ELLIS. I accept that amendment.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pay of one Indian school superintendent, $3,000.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out in lines 128 and 129 the words "three thousand dollars" and inserting the following:

"Two thousand nine hundred and fifty dollars: Provided, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to organize within the Indian Bureau a division of Indian education, of which said superintendent of Indian schools shall be chief; and the Secretary of the Interior shall assign to said division of Indian education a sufficient clerical force for the transaction of its business.

"It shall be the duty of said superintendent of Indian schools to locate and inaugurate such additional Indian schools as may be provided for from time to time; to prepare plans for and superintend the erection of new school buildings or the remodeling of old ones; to select and employ suitable teachers for said schools; to arrange and establish courses of study for the different schools, and to modify or change such courses from time to time as may be needful; to attend to and conduct the necessary purchases of books, maps, apparatus, and school supplies for such schools, and, so far as practicable, to visit and inspect all Indian schools, and to make such suggestions to those in charge as will, in his opinion, increase their usefulness and efficiency; and to make an annual report to the Secretary of the Interior covering the transactions of his division during the year, and the statistics relative to Indian education."

Mr. ELLIS. I make the point of order on that amendment that it changes existing law, that it is new legislation, that it most unquestionably increases expenditure, and that it is not germane, as it relates to a matter of department administration, and if enacted at all belongs entirely to another bill.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I hope the gentleman from Louisiana will withdraw his objection for a moment, that I may speak to the amendment I have offered.

Mr. ELLIS. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, I have not offered this amendment strictly of my own motion, but for the following reason: I had the honor to be designated as one of a committee of five by the national council of the Congregational churches of the United States at their last meeting to present to Congress the subject of Indian education. That committee has formulated, in substance, the amendment which I now offer. Whether or no it is amenable to the point of order raised by the honorable gentleman from Louisiana it is not necessary to discuss for the time being.

The purpose of the amendment is simply to define the duties of the present officer known as the superintendent of Indian schools, and to further organize the department of Indian education by the establishment of a "division of Indian education" within the Indian Bureau. Whether or no it would increase expenses I think does not appear on the face of the amendment. It reduces the salary of the superintendent by $50, and therefore it does upon the face of it reduce expenditures. And it does not call for the appointment of any additional clerks in the department, but simply provides for their assignment.

I will not speak further on the question of order. But I desire to call the attention of the House very briefly to a few points on this subject of Indian education. This subject, Mr. Chairman, is one of the great humanitarian problems of the day, and is well deserving the earnest attention of Congress. The race questions are among the great questions which have perplexed and troubled the American people. Ever since the formation of our Government we have had the negro question before us. After that was substantially settled we were troubled by the Mongolian or Chinese question. That has been put in shape and laid away on the shelf. And now we have the Indian question still before us. And I may say the Indian is like the poor—we have him always with us. From the time our fathers set foot on this continent this has been one of the troublesome questions we have had to deal with.

There have been several different ways tried of dealing with this question. We have at one time treated the Indian tribes as independent nations, with whom we could make treaties as with foreign powers. They have been nations to make treaties with until we have obtained their great domain; but we have not recognized them as nations for the purpose of maintaining and observing treaties on our part after we had gained possession of their lands.

Again, we have treated them as wild beasts without the rights of humanity, to be hunted with bloodhounds as they were in the Florida wars, and not entitled to the usages of civilized warfare.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. LONG was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. CUTCHEON.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts for his courtesy.

We have begun, Mr. Chairman, within the more recent period of our history to treat the Indians as human beings, rational and immortal, who may be civilized, educated, and Christianized. This last is the one plan that promises the ultimate solution of the Indian problem.

I believe that the friends of Indian education have themselves been surprised at the success of the new method and the readiness with which the Indian children take to education.

The old idea that "the only good Indians are dead Indians" has been given the lie at Carlisle, at Lincoln School, at Hampton, at Forest Grove, among the Dakota schools, and, in fact, wherever the educational plan has been faithfully tried.

This question of how to treat the Indian problem must be met. The old idea that the Indians are "dying out" is not a true one. At the present time they are increasing, and they will hereafter increase more rapidly. They are soon to become factors in our States and local communities. It is only a question of a few years when they are to become citizens, and it is for us to prepare them for the rights and duties of citizenship. The first thing is to educate the children. Little can be done for the older Indians but to keep them as peaceable and contented under their changed relations as practicable.

But our hope is in the young. The first thing for us to do is to carry out our treaty stipulations with these Indian tribes. In the last report of the superintendent of Indian schools, upon page 7, I find the following, which I will read:

Additional day-schools are also required at several of the agencies. In connection with this matter, I present a table showing our treaty obligations to several of the tribes named above, and others not included in the above list, by which it will be seen what our failures have been. Due consideration is also given to what has been done for each tribe named. It will be seen by reference to this table that the amount which would have been required to fulfill these treaty obligations up to and including the present fiscal year would have been $3,759,400.

Under our treaties with these several tribes we are bound to maintain one school for every thirty children of school age in the tribe, and one school-house and one teacher. There is due to these tribes, under these treaty stipulations, for this purpose, the sum of $3,759,400, as follows:

| Apache, Kiowa, and Comanche Indians | $284,200 |
| Bannock Indians | 44,200 |
| Cheyenne and Arapaho Indians | 283,100 |
| Crow Indians | 262,200 |
| Navajo Indians | 792,100 |
| Northern Cheyenne and Arapaho Indians | 167,800 |
| Shoshone Indians | 141,700 |
| Sioux Indians | 1,491,600 |
| Ute Indians | 292,500 |
| Total | 3,759,400 |

At the date of the last report of the superintendent there are seventy-five schools supported in whole or in part by the Government, at a total cost of $339,968.17 for the last fiscal year. I call attention here to an itemized table giving financial statistics of Indian boarding-schools for the year ending June 30, 1883.

The table is as follows:

Financial statistics of Indian boarding-schools for the year ending June 30, 1883.

a Remaining employés under contract. b Employés all under contract. c Employés furnished by religious societies.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The first thing we have to do for these Indians is to fulfill our treaty stipulations with them; to do simply what we have agreed to do; to put at their disposal for educational purposes this fund which we owe them, as honestly owe them as one man can owe another any honest debt.

The second thing we have to do is to require of them to hold their lands in severalty. The very foundation of civil order is the ownership of property and the responsibility for its use. It gives, first, local attachment and individuality; second, it inculcates respect for the rights of others; third, it creates a regard for law and order and a dependence upon orderly government. It inspires the spirit of patriotism and attachment to the Government which protects them and their property.

In the third place, we must give them civil rights under civilized law, and political rights as rapidly as their tribal relations are dissolved. Until these people are made amenable to the laws of the Commonwealth within which they reside they will progress but slowly and under great disadvantages. They must be incorporated into the great body of law-acknowledging and law-abiding citizens, and then they will quickly assimilate in manners, in progress, in religion, and to those around them, and, swept along in the great current of civilizing influence, they will mingle in the common mass, and the "Indian problem" will be finally solved. But to this end we must provide the adequate means, and the first and most important of these is to keep all our treaty stipulations in the matter of education.

I am thankful for the noble words spoken yesterday by the gentleman in charge of this bill [Mr. ELLIS], and I trust they may be potent in this Chamber to induce a treatment of this subject worthy of the great Republic of the nineteenth century, which ought to keep its treaties with the weakest more scrupulously than with the strongest power.

Mr. ELLIS. I renew the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is raised upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] that it changes existing law and does not reduce expenditures.

Mr. ELLIS. And is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no difficulty in deciding the point of order. It is true that the amendment does propose to reduce the salary of the superintendent by the amount of $50. But associated with that proposition to reduce the salary of the superintendent is also a proposition having no natural connection with it whatever, requiring the Secretary of the Interior to organize in the Indian Bureau a separate division of education, and to assign a clerical force to that division, &c. The Chair sustains the point of order against the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For contingencies of the Indian service, including traveling and incidental expenses of Indian agents and of their offices, and traveling and incidental expenses of agents, and for pay of employés not otherwise provided for, and for pay of the four special agents, at $2,000 per annum each, $40,000.

Mr. ELLIS. By instructions of the Committee on Appropriations, I move to amend the paragraph just read by inserting between the words "of" and "agents" the word "special;" so that it will read "traveling and incidental expenses of special agents." That is rendered necessary in order to designate which class of agents are here provided for. There are two kinds, special agents and ordinary agents.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ELLIS. By instructions of the committee, I move to further amend the paragraph just read by adding the proviso which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That special agents shall be allowed $3 per diem for traveling and incidental expenses while traveling and actually on duty in the field, exclusive of cost of transportation and sleeping-car fare.

Mr. ELLIS. That is also rendered necessary in order to fix the compensation which these special agents shall receive.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following, under the head of "Fulfilling treaties with Indian tribes—Apaches, Kiowas, and Comanches:"

For pay of physician and teachers, $2,500; in all, $54,700.

Mr. ELLIS. By instructions of the Committee on Appropriations, I move to amend the paragraph just read by inserting between the words "and" and "teachers" the word "two;" so that it will read "for pay of physician and two teachers." That is to render certain the number of teachers and the compensation they shall receive.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BELFORD. I move to amend by inserting after the paragraph last read that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas by the agreement now existing between the United States and the confederated bands of the Ute Indians of Colorado, as set forth in the act of Congress entitled "An act to accept and ratify the agreement submitted by the confederated bands of Ute Indians in Colorado for the sale of their reservation in said State, and for other purposes, and to make the necessary appropriations for carrying out the same," approved June 15, A. D. 1880, it is, among other things, provided that "the Southern Utes agree to remove to and settle upon the unoccupied agricultural lands on the La Plata River in Colorado; and if there should not be a sufficiency of such lands on the La Plata River and in its vicinity in Colorado, then upon such other unoccupied agricultural lands as may be found on the La Plata River or in its vicinity in New Mexico; and

Whereas it now appears that it is impracticable to carry out the intent of said agreement as to the location of the lands thereby intended to be allotted to the members of said Southern Band of Ute Indians, for the reason that no sufficient quantity of such lands as are contemplated in and by said agreement exists in the several localities and vicinity thereof designated in said agreement and act out of which the allotments therein provided for can be made: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That instead of lands on the said La Plata River and vicinity in Colorado and New Mexico, as provided in and by said agreement, lands be allotted to the said Southern Utes in that part of the Territory of Utah known as the Uintah reservation, or in the vicinity thereof, the same in all cases to be surveyed, selected, and allotted in manner and form in all respects the same, except as is hereinafter provided, in severalty, to such and every member of said Southern Band of Utes entitled to receive lands under the provisions of said agreement as therein is provided touching the lands therein mentioned.

SEC. 2. That a commissioner shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall proceed to carry out the provisions of the condition secondly set forth in the first section of said act, in all respects as therein provided, as though this act had not been passed, save that in making apportionment of the moneys appropriated by Congress for the purposes in said second condition expressed one-third thereof shall be apportioned to the Southern Utes who shall settle on lands in said Uintah reservation, or in the vicinity thereof; and they shall perform all other duties imposed upon them by the several sections of said act in all respects as therein provided, except that they shall file copies of the report in the second section of said act required in the General Land Office and in the offices of the surveyors-general of Colorado and Utah only.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be surveyed, under the direction of said commissioner, lands in the said Uintah reservation, or in the vicinity thereof, instead of lands in the localities mentioned in said act for allotment to the said Southern Utes, sufficient in quantity to secure the settlement in severalty on said reservation of all of said band; and said commissioners shall make allotment to each and every of said Southern Band, out of the lands so surveyed, of one-half the quantity of agricultural lands and of triple the quantity of grazing lands as in said act provided; and the President of the United States shall cause patents to be issued to each and every allottee under the provisions of this act for the lands allotted them severally, with the same conditions, restrictions, and limitations contained therein as are provided in said agreement touching the lands therein provided to be allotted to said Indians; and the Southern Utes receiving allotments of lands severally under the provisions of this act in said Uintah reservation, or in the vicinity thereof, shall be deemed and held to have received and accepted the same in lieu of the land he or she would have been entitled to receive under the provisions of said agreement if the provisions thereof hereby modified had remained unchanged.

SEC. 4. That of the proceeds of the sale of the lands released and conveyed to the United States by the confederated bands of the Ute Indians, to be applied in payment for the lands (at $1.25 per acre) which may be ceded to the said Indians by the United States outside of their reservation, as provided in the third section of said act of June 15, 1880, so much thereof as shall be required (in the proper execution of the said provision) to pay for the lands ceded and to be allotted to the White River Utes within the Uintah reservation under the terms of the existing agreement, and also for the lands that shall be ceded and allotted to the said Southern Band within the said reservation under the provisions of this act, shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Uintah Band of Ute Indians residing upon said Uintah reservation, and draw interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, which interest shall be paid to the said Uintah Band, or members thereof, or used for their benefit, as the President may direct, annually forever.

SEC. 5. That before any of the provisions of this act shall be executed, the full and free consent of said Southern Band of Ute Indians shall be obtained to the exchange of lands on the La Plata River and vicinity (in Colorado and New Mexico) for lands within the Uintah reservation, or in the vicinity thereof (in Utah), as provided, in effect, in the first section of this act, and also to the provision in the third section changing (by decreasing) the quantity of agricultural lands and (by increasing) the quantity of grazing lands to be allotted to each and every of said Southern Band, which consent shall be expressed in writing and signed by not less than three-fourths of the adult male Indians of said Southern Band, and shall bear the certificate of the agency interpreter, if there be one in the employ of the Southern Ute agency at the time of obtaining said consent; and if not, then of such other interpreter or interpreters as may be employed by the commissioner charged with the duty of procuring the said consent as hereinafter provided. The said consent in writing shall also bear the certificate of the agent in charge of said agency at the time, and of the commissioner aforesaid. The certificate of the interpreter or interpreters shall set forth and exhibit the fact that all of the provisions of this act requiring the consent of said Indians were read and explained by him or them (as the case may be), and were thoroughly understood by the said Indians before signing said consent, and also the date and place when and where said consent was signed. The certificate of the agent and commissioner aforesaid shall set forth and exhibit the fact that they witnessed each and every signature thereto, and that the provisions of this act requiring the consent of the Indians were carefully read to and fully understood by the said Indians before the signing of said consent by them, the said Indians; the date and place when and where said consent was signed; and that the signatures thereto represent not less than three-fourths of the adult male members of said tribe of Southern Utes. Whereupon said consent shall be filed with the Secretary of the Interior, and the provisions of this act shall be held and deemed to be in effect.

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of the Interior shall have power to make all needful rules and regulations to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

SEC. 7. That all provisions of said agreement, and said act accepting and ratifying the same, which are inconsistent with the provisions of this act shall be deemed and held hereby wholly and forever set aside and of no effect.

Mr. ELLIS. What is that? Is not that a Senate bill pending on the Speaker's table?

Mr. BELFORD. I would like my friend to reserve his point of order.

Mr. ELLIS. I make a point of order upon this amendment under the fourth clause of Rule XXI. This is a bill pending before the House.

Mr. BELFORD. I would like my friend to reserve his point of order until I can explain the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BELFORD. This does not change existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not the point of order. The point is that this is a bill pending in the House.

Mr. BELFORD. Well, we are dealing with Indians; we have in this bill provisions for the Kiowas, the Comanches, and other tribes; but when I want to deal with the Utes, the gentleman from Louisiana refuses to allow me even to present the case to this House.

Mr. ELLIS. If the gentleman wants to make a speech I will withhold the point of order for a moment.

Mr. BELFORD. If the amendment is ruled out, I move to amend by striking out the last word of the pending paragraph. Mr. Chairman, of course I took up that Senate bill not as a Senate bill but as an amendment which I desired to offer to this bill. I had not time to copy it as an amendment. I have always been friendly with my friend from Louisiana, and I thought he would not make a point of order on this proposition simply because I had not time to copy it. Of course it is a Senate bill; but you know very well and I know very well that we have not gone to the Speaker's table once during this session of Congress. We have never taken up any Calendar except on private-bill day. We have been restrained and restricted by the infernal rules of this House, which my friend from Louisiana has helped to perpetuate.

What is this bill? It does not change existing law. In 1880, when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] was Speaker of this House, we passed here a bill authorizing the transfer of the Ute Indians to Utah, taking them away from the White River agency. It was further provided in the bill that the Southern Utes should be transferred to the La Plata River and located there, provided land could be found for the purpose. The Government sent out a commission, which reported to the Secretary of the Interior that adequate and suitable land could not be found on that river for the support of those Indians. What is this amendment but an attempt to locate them with the White River Utes, who were sent over to the Uintah agency and given a magnificent tract of land provided they would consent to the transfer? Yet the gentleman from Louisiana, living a thousand miles from my State, rises up in his majesty and wrath and makes a point of order. Instead of doing these Indians good, he is absolutely doing them injury; because the region of country to which I propose to send them is better than that they now occupy.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw his pro forma amendment?

Mr. BELFORD. Yes, sir; I give it up.

Mr. ELLIS. I will say to my friend from Colorado that I made the point of order not in any spirit of unfriendliness to him, but in a spirit of friendliness to the country.

The Clerk read as follows:

For interest on $390,257.92, at 5 per cent. per annum, for education, support of the government, and other beneficial purposes, under the direction of the general council of the Choctaws, in conformity with the provisions contained in the ninth and thirteenth articles of treaty of January 20, 1825, and treaty of June 22, 1855, $19,512.89; in all, $30,032.89.

Mr. BRENTS. I move to amend by adding to the paragraph just read the provision which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Columbias and Colvilles.—For the purpose of carrying into effect the agreement entered into at the city of Washington on the 7th day of July, 1883, between the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and Chief Moses and other Indians of the Columbia and Colville reservations in Washington Territory, which agreement is hereby accepted, ratified, and confirmed, including all expenses incident thereto, $85,000, or so much thereof as may be required therefor, to be immediately available: Provided, That Sarsarpkin and the Indians now residing on said Columbia reservation shall elect within one year from the passage of this act whether they will remain upon said reservation on the terms therein stipulated or remove to the Colville reservation: And provided further, That in case said Indians shall elect to remain on said Columbia reservation, the Secretary of the Interior shall cause the quantity of land therein stipulated to be allowed them to be selected in as compact form as possible, the same when so selected to be held for the exclusive use and occupation of said Indians, and the remainder of said reservation to be thereupon restored to the public domain.

Mr. ELLIS. I reserve a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. BRENTS. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Indian Affairs, having had under consideration the message of the President of the United States recommending this appropriation for carrying out this treaty, reported on the day before yesterday in favor of this proposition with a single exception; that is, that the amount be immediately available. It is a matter of the utmost urgency and importance that immediate action should be taken to carry out this treaty.

Some seven years ago we had what was called the Nez Percé Indian outbreak, extending through Northern Idaho, Eastern Washington, and into Montana. The next year we had the Bannock outbreak, extending nearly through Idaho, Eastern Oregon, and Eastern Washington. At that time Moses and his band were ready to join the hostile Bannocks, but were prevented by the patrolling of the Columbia River and the destruction of the ferry-boats, skiffs, and canoes. But many of his band committed depredations upon the whites, and a family by the name of Perkins and some others were murdered. The next year an indictment was found against Moses for complicity and participation in those murders. He resisted arrest, but after a battle was captured and put into the Yakima jail. Being sent for by the Secretary of the Interior, he came to Washington. He was allowed, in an agreement made here, nearly three million acres of public land, set apart as a reservation by executive order. It included a part of lands which had been for years and was still occupied by miners, and of course they had to suspend their mining operations. Their machinery, costing large outlays, was going to decay, and they importuned the present Secretary of the Interior to open up a part of this reservation. This was done some time last spring. Of course it produced trouble again with these Indians. The Secretary of the Interior sent for Moses, Sarsarpkin, and other principal chiefs. They came on here, and in July last entered into this agreement, which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the conference with Chief Moses and Sarsarpkin, of the Columbia reservation, and Tonasket and Lot, of the Colville reservation, had this day, the following was substantially what was asked for by the Indians:

Tonasket asked for a saw and grist mill, a boarding-school to be established at Buonaparte Creek to accommodate one hundred pupils, and a physician to reside with them, and $100 to himself each year.

Sarsarpkin asked to be allowed to remain on the Columbia reservation with his people, where they now live, and to be protected in their rights as settlers, and, in addition to the ground they now have under cultivation within the limit of the fifteen-mile strip cut off from the northern portion of the Columbia reservation, to be allowed to select enough more unoccupied land in severalty to make a total to Sarsarpkin of four square miles, being 2,560 acres of land, and each head of a family or male adult one square mile, or to move onto the Colville reservation, if they so desire; and in case they so remove and relinquish all their claims on the Columbia reservation, he is to receive one hundred head of cows for himself and people and such farming implements as may be necessary.

All of which the Secretary agrees they should have, and that he will ask Congress to make an appropriation to enable him to perform.

The Secretary also agrees to ask Congress to make an appropriation to enable him to purchase for Chief Moses a sufficient number of cows to furnish each one of his band with two cows; also to give Moses $1,000 for the purpose of erecting a dwelling-house for himself; also to erect a building and maintain a school therein; also to construct a saw-mill and grist-mill as soon as the same shall be required for use; also that each head of a family or male adult person shall be furnished with one wagon, one double set of harness, one grain-cradle, one plow, one harrow, one scythe, one hoe, and such other agricultural implements as may be necessary.

And on condition that Chief Moses and his people keep this agreement faithfully, he is to be paid in cash, in addition to all of the above, $1,000 per annum during his life.

All this on condition that Chief Moses shall remove to the Colville reservation and relinquish all claim upon the Government for any land situate elsewhere.

Further, that the Government will secure to Chief Moses and his people, as well as to all other Indians who may go onto the Colville reservation and engage in farming, equal rights and protection alike with all other Indians now on the Colville reservation, and will afford him any assistance necessary to enable him to carry out the terms of this agreement on the part of himself and his people. That until he and his people are located permanently on the Colville reservation his status shall remain as now, and the police over his people shall be vested in the military, and all money or other articles to be furnished him and his people shall be sent to some point in the locality of his people, there to be distributed as provided. All other Indians now living on the Columbia reservation shall be entitled to six hundred and forty acres, or one square mile, of land to each head of family or male adult, in the possession and ownership of which they shall be guaranteed and protected. Or should they move onto the Colville reservation within two years they will be provided with such farming implements as may be required, provided they surrender all rights to the Columbia reservation.

All of the foregoing is upon the condition that Congress will make an appropriation of funds necessary to accomplish the foregoing, and confirm this agreement; and also with the understanding that Chief Moses, or any of the Indians heretofore mentioned, shall not be required to remove to the Colville reservation until Congress does make such appropriation, &c.

H. M. TELLER,

Mr. BRENTS. Mr. Chairman, I will also request the Clerk to read the letter of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, transmitted with the special message of the President, in relation to the matter.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, November 6, 1883.

SIR: In the spring of 1879, Chief Moses, who during the preceding summer had been under arrest at Yakima City, Wash., for alleged complicity in the murder of a white family, and who had been taken in charge by Agent Wilbur, came to this city.

Several conferences were held with him by Secretary Schurz, as the result of which Moses signed an agreement on the 18th of April, 1879, to the effect that in consideration of a reservation therein described, to be set apart for the permanent use and occupation of himself and his people, and such other friendly Indians as might elect to settle with his consent thereon, he thereby relinquished to the United States all right, title, or interest, possessory or otherwise, in and to any and all lands then or theretofore claimed by himself or people in Washington Territory.

He further agreed that he and his people would immediately remove to the reservation described and settle upon the same, and that they would not leave said reservation without the consent of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

By an executive order dated April 19, 1879, a tract of country was withdrawn from sale and set apart as a reservation for the permanent use and occupation of Chief Moses and his people, and such other friendly Indians as might elect to settle thereon, with his consent and that of the Secretary of the Interior. The boundaries were the same as those described in the agreement above mentioned, and are as follows, namely:

"Commencing at the intersection of the forty-mile limits of the branch line of the Northern Pacific Railroad with the Okinakane River; thence up said river to the boundary line between the United States and British Columbia; thence west on said boundary line to the forty-fourth degree of longitude west from Washington; thence south on said degree of longitude to its intersection with the forty-mile limits of the branch line of the Northern Pacific Railroad; and thence with the line of said forty-mile limits to the place of beginning."

It is stated in the annual report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for the year 1879 (page XVI) that it was deemed expedient to accede to the earnest desire of Moses to have a new reservation set apart for his occupancy, because of the hardship and unjust treatment to which he had been subjected and in acknowledgment of his valuable services in controlling the disaffected and in preserving the peace during the excitement occasioned by the hostilities of the Bannocks. By this arrangement an expensive war was undoubtedly avoided. It having been the desire of Chief Moses that all that part of Washington Territory lying between the Columbia and Okinakane Rivers on the east, and the forty-fourth degree of longitute west from Washington on the west, the boundary line between the United States and the British Possessions on the north, and so far south as to include Lake Chelan, should be included in the reservation, and the line of the branch of the Northern Pacific Railroad having been so amended as to permit it, an executive order was issued March 6, 1880, adding to the reservation that portion of the country above described which had theretofore fallen within the forty-mile limits of said railroad. The boundaries of this addition are described as follows:

"Commencing at a point where the south boundary line of the reservation created for Chief Moses and his people by executive order, dated April 19, 1879, intersects the Okinakane River; thence down said river to its confluence with the Columbia River; thence across and down the east bank of said Columbia River to a point opposite the river forming the outlet to Lake Chelan; thence across said Columbia River and along the south shore of said outlet to Lake Chelan; thence following the meanderings of south bank of said lake to the mouth of the Shehekin Creek; thence up and along the south bank of said creek to its source; thence due west to the forty-fourth degree of longitude west from Washington; thence north along said degree to the south boundary of the reservation created by executive order of April 19, 1879; thence along the south boundary of said reservation to the place of beginning."

The area of the reservation as enlarged was estimated at 2,992,240 acres.

Soon after the executive order of April 19, 1879, was issued, representations began to be made that the northern portion of the reservation contained valuable mines which had been discovered and worked previous to that date, in consequence of which the Department, on October 11, 1882, directed Inspector Gardner to investigate the matter, and also the location and requirements of the Indians.

Inspector Gardner, under date of November 29, 1882, reported that Moses was living upon the Colville reservation, in accordance with permission granted him by Department telegram of May 17, 1879; that his total adherents numbered two hundred and twenty people, of whom one hundred and forty-four resided upon the Columbia or Moses reservation; that the mining district was located in the northern portion of the reservation, the mines being considered very valuable both in gold and silver; that prior to the executive order of April 19, 1879, white men had settled upon, discovered, claimed according to law, and worked their claims; and that it would appear that, as an act of justice, the prior rights of these parties should be respected and protected.

Inspector Gardner recommended that the entire reservation be restored to the public domain, Chief Moses and his people to be located on the southern portion of the Colville reservation, and as the Columbia reservation was given to him and his people in good faith, that they should be compensated for the restoration of this tract of country. As compensation for the relinquishment of the reservation he recommended that there be allotted to Moses and to each male adult or head of a family belonging to Moses' band three hundred and twenty acres of agricultural land, which should be inalienable and free from taxation for twenty-five years, at the expiration of which time a patent should issue; that $20,000 be appropriated to be expended for their benefit, to make provision for their support, and in the purchase of agricultural implements, wagons, harness, and tools; and that the sum of $10,000 be appropriated thereafter annually for the period of eight years, to be expended for the sole use and benefit of said Indians, as the President might direct.

In view of this report it was decided to restore to the public domain that portion of the reservation upon which the mines were located, leaving the question of the restoration of the remaining portion of the reservation and of compensation for future consideration.

Accordingly, on the 23d of February, 1883, an executive order was issued restoring to the public domain the following-described tract of country, namely:

"Commencing at the intersection of the forty-fourth degree of longitude west from Washington with the boundary line between the United States and British Columbia; thence due south fifteen miles; thence due east to the Okinakane River; thence up said river to the boundary line between the United States and British Columbia; thence west along said boundary line to the place of beginning."

It is estimated that the tract restored contains 749,200 acres, leaving an area of 2,243,040 acres at present included within the reservation.

In April last the commanding general of the Department of the Columbia represented that the action of this Department in restoring the fifteen-mile strip above described had occasioned much excitement among the Moses Indians, whose disposition was much more hostile than friendly, and requested authority to send Chief Moses, with one officer and an interpreter, to Washington, in order that such action might be taken as would restore peaceful relations between all concerned.

The Department, on the recommendation of this office, declined to grant the authority, but subsequently (May 1, 1883) recommended that the War Department bring Moses and two or three other prominent Indians of the band to Washington, if it had the necessary funds at its disposal, for the purpose of conference regarding the pending difficulties.

Accordingly, Chief Moses and Sarsarpkin, of the Columbia reservation, and Tonasket and Lot, of the Colville reservation, under the charge of Capt. F. D. Baldwin, Fifth United States Infantry, visited Washington in July last, and entered into an agreement, a memorandum of which was signed by Moses, Sarsarpkin, and Tonasket, and by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, on the 7th of July last. (Copy inclosed.)

This agreement, if ratified by Congress, will restore to the public domain some 2,243,040 acres in addition to the 749,300 acres restored by the executive order of February 23, 1883, in case the Indians elect to remove to the Colville reservation, while if they decide to remain, some 22,000 acres only will be required to allot the quantity of land stipulated in the agreement.

The terms upon which the Indians agree to relinquish their claims to this vast tract of country, are regarded as favorable to the Government, the amount of money required to carry the agreement into effect being comparatively small, while the proposed disposition of the funds is such as will promote the education and civilization of the Indians, and eventually render them self-supporting.

It is not considered desirable that this large reservation should be long held for the few Indians who live upon it. It is clear, however, that they are entitled to some compensation for its relinquishment, as it was given them by the officers of the Government in whose assurances they must have had confidence.

I have therefore prepared the draught of a bill providing for the ratification of the agreement and the necessary appropriation for carrying it into effect. From the nature of the stipulation, it appears to be impossible to submit a detailed estimate of the funds required. I have named a sum, $85,000, which it is believed will be sufficient for the purposes required.

As the agreement leaves the question of the removal of certain of the Indians to the Colville reservation optional with them, I have inserted a section requiring them to decide within one year from the passage of the bill whether they will remain or move.

I respectfully recommend that this draught be submitted to Congress with a request for favorable action.

I inclose two copies of this report, three copies of the proposed bill, and two copies of the agreements of April 18, 1879, and July 7, 1883.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. PRICE, Commissioner.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

Mr. BRENTS. I now ask the Clerk to read an extract from a letter of Brigadier-General Miles, who commands the military district, in reference to this matter.

The Clerk read as follows:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE COLUMBIA,
Vancouver Barracks, December 3, 1883.

SIR: I have the honor to forward herewith the report of Captain Baldwin, with inclosures, and respectfully invite attention to the higher authorities to the same, with the request that the subject be laid before Congress at as early a day as practicable.

Last spring the Indians interested in what is known as the Moses reservation became much disturbed by the encroachment of white settlers and the cutting down of their reservation by executive order. This disaffection extended to other Indians throughout Northern Washington and Idaho Territories, and at one time threatened to involve a large section of country in a serious Indian war.

After fully investigating the difficulty, I requested authority to send the chiefs to Washington to explain and, if possible, settle their difficulties. This request was granted by the Secretary of War ordering them to Washington with suitable escort. They were sent under charge of Captain Baldwin, and it resulted in an amicable and most judicious settlement between the honorable Secretary of the Interior and the Indians.

By the terms of this agreement the Indians surrender the valuable and extensive reservation, comprising some 2,649,600 acres of territory (except what land the few families remaining take in severalty), in consideration of the Government giving them protection on the Colville reservation and the means of making themselves self-supporting. This settlement is most beneficial to the Government, the white settlements of the country, and to Indians, and I earnestly recommend that the terms be faithfully complied with on the part of the Government.

It will require an appropriation by Congress of $86,960.30 the first year, the second year $8,800, and the third year $6,300, to fulfill the obligations of the Government. It will restore to the public domain a tract of land worth at least $3,000,000.

This is a case where the Government has the opportunity and, by fair dealing and proper consideration for the interests of the Indians, can, for a very moderate consideration, locate a very large number of Indians in severalty or by families and put them in a way to make themselves self-supporting and to become a productive, prosperous people. I earnestly request that every means may be taken to promote the success of this measure.

The experience and good judgment of Captain Baldwin, judge-advocate of the Department, has been of much benefit in bringing about this settlement, and I would respectfully request that he be ordered to Washington to fully explain to the authorities or to the committee of Congress the importance of the various interests involved in this settlement.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

NELSON A. MILES,
Brigadier-General, Commanding.

Official copy:

O. D. GREENE, A. A. G.

To the ASSISTANT ADJUTANT-GENERAL,
Division of the Pacific, Presidio, San Francisco.

Mr. BRENTS. Mr. Chairman, it is a matter of most urgent necessity that this treaty should be ratified at once and provision made for carrying out the obligations of the Government thereunder. The time has come for the planting of spring crops and the beginning of the season's work. They expected the implements of husbandry, teams, seed, and other articles specified in the agreement to have been provided and the treaty carried into effect before now. They are becoming distrustful, restive, and threaten to go upon the war-path. Settlement is pressing upon the reservation. The Indians, though not very numerous, will probably begin their depredations upon the whites, and another outbreak may ensue. While it can not be a very formidable one, it will doubtless cost the Government much more to suppress it than the amount required to fulfill the treaty. The treaty is favorable to the Government, and fair to the Indians. Good faith and good policy both demand of us that we should keep the agreement with these Indians, as indeed we should always keep our agreements with all Indians, and all others, and that this appropriation should be made, and made now. It is urgently recommended by Captain Baldwin, judge-advocate of the district, who, perhaps, had more to do in negotiating and bringing about the treaty than any other man; the commander of the district, Brigadier-General Miles; the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the Secretary of the Interior, the President, and the Committee on Indian Affairs. I earnestly hope the point of order will not be insisted on, and that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. ELLIS. I have no authority to accept for the committee the amendment of the gentleman from Washington Territory. But I wish to state to the House it is one of these cases where the Government of the United States has made a treaty with Indians and has taken hold of their end of it by using the lands and yet have not ratified the treaty or paid what they agreed to pay. I believe this treaty should be ratified, and I believe this amendment should prevail. I believe the Government's obligations to the Indians should be held sacred. If we expect to draw the Indian to truth and honor we should be truthful and honorable ourselves. I believe the amendment should prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw his point of order?

Mr. ELLIS. I do.

Mr. BRENTS. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

CROWS.

For third of twenty-five installments, as provided in agreement with the Crows, dated June 12, 1880, to be used by the Secretary of the Interior in such manner as the President may direct, $30,000; and $3,000 of this sum shall be expended for educational purposes.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I move to strike out the words "and $3,000 of this sum shall be expended for educational purposes," because in my belief that money spent for day-schools is only wasted.

Mr. ELLIS. I am willing to agree to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For settlement, support, and civilization of Kickapoo Indians in the Indian Territory, lately removed from Mexico, including such as may be removed hereafter, $4,000; in all, $8,493.24.

Mr. ELLIS. By direction of the committee, I offer the following amendment.

After line 368 insert the following:

"This amount, to enable the President of the United States to carry out the provisions of the third article of the treaty made with the Kickapoo Indians dated June 28, 1862, to be paid, under such rules as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, to eleven Kickapoo Indians who have become citizens of the United States, the same being their proportion of $100,000 provided for said tribe for education and other beneficial purposes under treaty of May 18, 1854, $3,716.21; and the Secretary of the Interior is directed to pay also to the said eleven Kickapoos their proportion of the tribal fund held in trust by the United States, and deposited in the United States Treasury, $3,716.21."

Mr. ELLIS. That is in strict accordance with the provisions of the treaty referred to. These eleven Kickapoo Indians have become civilized; they have become citizens of the United States and are entitled under the provisions of the treaty to this proportion of their tribal fund. It was by accident it was not included in the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

MIAMIES OF EEL RIVER.

For permanent annuity, in goods or otherwise, per fourth article of treaty of August 3, 1795, $500.

For permanent annuity, in goods or otherwise, per articles of treaty of August 21, 1805, $250.

For permanent annuity, in goods or otherwise, per third and separate articles of treaty of September 30, 1809, $350; in all, $1,100.

Mr. ELLIS. Under instructions from the committee I offer the amendment which I send to the desk. It is offered at the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS].

At the end of line 411 insert:

"Provided, That Matilda Teresa Rousseau, of Saint Joseph County, Indiana, shall be entitled to her pro rata share of money heretofore allowed the Miami tribe of Indians by the act of March 3, 1881, notwithstanding she was not included in the enumeration provided in that act; and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to allow her the sum that will be due as provided."

Mr. CALKINS. That is right.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Omahas:

For second of twelve installments, being last series, in money or otherwise, per fourth article treaty of March 16, 1854, $10,000; $7,500 of which shall be expended for educational purposes.

Mr. ELLIS. By instructions of the committee, I offer this amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 19, in line 448, strike out the word "shall" and insert in lieu thereof the words "may in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Shoshones and Bannocks:

For school buildings and teachers, as provided for by article 7 of the same treaty, $3,000.

Mr. BUDD. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Insert after the word "dollars," on page 29, in line 682:

"For paying the claim of J. M. Hogan, of Stockton, Cal., for depredations committed by the Shoshone Indians, and which said claim has been examined and allowed by the Secretary of the Interior and reported to Congress for the sum of $6,600—$6,600."

Mr. ELLIS. I reserve the point of order until I can hear from the gentleman from California.

Mr. BUDD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state to the committee that these Indians, for which we are about to make an appropriation of some twenty-odd thousand dollars, some years ago committed depredations upon the property of J. M. Hogan, a resident of the city of Stockton, Cal., a man whom I have known for over twenty years, and destroyed thousands of dollars' worth of such property. They also wounded him, and he has been a cripple ever since from the effects thereof.

The claim has been presented to the Department of the Interior, as by law required, and has been fully examined into and allowed by the Secretary of the Interior. It has been reported by the Secretary to this Congress for a special appropriation, which the law requires in such cases. It was so reported December 5, 1883, and reported to the Committee on Indian Affairs on December 14. The allowance was for the sum of $6,600.

Under the law as it now exists the Secretary of the Interior may allow a claim, but has no authority to pay it until Congress makes a special appropriation for that purpose. Under the law passed in 1770, and which was in effect until 1834, the Government guaranteed to all persons payment for all damages caused by Indian depredations. In that year (1834) the law was amended and broadened so that the payments might come directly out of the Treasury of the United States. This law was changed in 1859 or 1860. The act of 1872 requires the Secretary to investigate these matters, to pass upon the claims, to allow them, and to report to Congress for a special appropriation to be made for their payment.

Mr. ELLIS. I would like to ask the gentleman if this claim has been before any committee of this House?

Mr. BUDD. I believe it has, sir.

Mr. ELLIS. Has it been reported from any committee?

Mr. BUDD. It has not been, so far as I am aware.

This amendment is, Mr. Chairman, merely a matter of absolute justice. There is the utmost propriety in the payment of this claim. It is a claim with which I am somewhat acquainted, for I have inquired into the facts carefully. I know personally that Mr. Hogan is lame and has been so for some years past, and that the claim was allowed by the Secretary of the Interior. Now if a white man injures an Indian or destroys his property or steals it the Government of the United States guarantees the right to that Indian to have the white man prosecuted in the courts, and to recover double the amount of damages done.

If the white man has not the money, then the Government of the United States pays to the Indian, out of the public Treasury, the amount of the claim. Why, then, should it be otherwise in the case of the destruction or depredations committed upon the property of a citizen of the United States by an Indian? Here is the case of a man, healthy, vigorous, attending to his business, who is pounced upon by the Indians, robbed of his property, and maltreated and severely wounded by them. He can not pursue the Indians within their reservation; he can not sue them in the courts. There is no remedy open to him except by act of Congress, which has thrown a mantle of protection over the redskin. Now, under the law, as I have said, the Department must examine the matter and must pass upon it. In this case it has already examined and passed upon the merits and recommended that this amount shall be paid. After a thorough examination the Secretary of the Interior reports to Congress for a special appropriation. So far all is well. The law has thus far been carried out, and all that remains to be done is to make the special appropriation to pay the allowed claim.

Mr. ELLIS. Was a bill introduced?

Mr. BUDD. Yes, sir. And I simply ask you gentlemen of the committee at this time to allow this matter to go in as a special appropriation under the head of the appropriations for the Shoshones, who committed the depredation. And I beg the gentleman from Louisiana not to raise that point of order.

Mr. ELLIS. I must insist on the point of order that this is new legislation and does not retrench expenditure.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BUDD. I move pro forma to strike out the last word of the paragraph. This simply exemplifies the extreme kindness we show to the Indians of the United States. We appropriate to their sole use $60 a head as has been asserted to-day; in all, some $9,000,000 a year. If a white man sells them liquor or harms them, he is punished. But they are the wards of the Government and far above the law. There is no remedy left open to a citizen of the United States as against them. When the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] a short time since said he did not see why we should support these Indian paupers in preference to supporting our own paupers, the learned gentleman from Iowa replied that we had taken charge of them and ought to have some sympathy for them. He said equity had arisen in their behalf.

I ask gentlemen whether the equity is not much greater in favor of a settler who the Government of the United States says may go on or over the public land and be protected? Here is a case where a man twenty years ago suffered as I have described at the hands of this very Indian tribe that you are now patting on the back, feeding, and pampering till they get fat and strong enough and audacious enough to go out and commit the most diabolical outrages on man, woman, and child, burn hamlets or village, or commit some other crimes. Then when the case goes before the Department, as the law directs, it will be fully examined into and allowed; but when in due course it comes before Congress in the shape of a bill, that bill goes to a committee and if reported goes on the Calendar and under the rules it sleeps forever, because not reached.

If one wishes to advance it and tack it onto the very clause of a bill making appropriations for the same Indians who did the damage, a place where it ought to be, a point of order is raised and the bill goes over again. I introduced this amendment knowing it was subject to the point of order, but hoping that, in view of the action of the Department, the point would not be made, as the claim must be paid some time; but should the point be made, I desired by my proposed amendment to emphasize the outrageousness of the Government policy in favor of the Indians and against persons who bear the burdens of Government. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For subsistence of the Sioux and for purposes of their civilization, as per agreement ratified by act of Congress approved February 28, 1877, $1,225,000: Provided,

That the supplies issued under this appropriation shall not be issued for a greater length of time at any one time of issue than ten days.

Mr. ELLIS. By direction of the committee, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 734, after the word "dollars," insert "and not exceeding $70,000 of this amount may be used for the transportation of supplies from the termination of railroad or steamboat transportation; and in this service Indians shall be employed wherever practicable."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For pay of employés at the several Ute agencies, $5,000; in all, $63,020.

Mr. BELFORD. I have been styled a barbarian from the West, but I wish to say I am willing to do more for the Indians than these civilized Christians in the East. I desire, therefore, to increase the appropriation for these Indians who have been removed from my State to another.

I offer this amendment because I have discovered a disposition in this House to decrease the appropriations instead of increasing them. I want to expend some of my sympathy on the Indians. I want to open the vaults of the Treasury [laughter] and contribute some of the surplus millions of money there to feeding these magnificent examples of American civilization. Therefore I desire this appropriation to be increased from $63,020 to $83,025.

It is very delightful to sit on the floor of this House and hear gentlemen who live in the Eastern States and who have stolen every acre that they possess and enjoy from the Indians, to hear them read us lectures about God and morality. That is a spectacle we witness almost every day.

For my part I have no practical or actual sympathy with any Indian tribe whatever. I believe a worthless people should depart from the face of this earth, and that no race that will not work should be paid as the beneficiaries of this nation. But to show my great respect for the Christian religion and the merciful character of this Government I commend to the support of my friends in this House the amendment I have indicated.

Oh, I wish you could kneel on your knees on the Western frontiers while they took off your scalps. [Laughter.] I wish you could travel on stage-coaches with a revolver across your knees and acting perpetually as a sentinel in getting to a given point. I know your soul would also be inspired by that pity which falls like the dew drops from heaven upon the dry and thirsty souls of the people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BELFORD. I ask for a vote on my amendment.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 9, noes 37.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For instruction, support, and civilization of the Navajo Indians, including pay of employés, and medicines, $30,000; and not exceeding $1,200 of this amount shall be paid for a clerk.

Mr. ELLIS. Under instructions from the Committee on Appropriations, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 904 strike out the word "shall" and insert the word "may;" so that it will read:

"Not exceeding $1,200 of this amount may be paid for a clerk."

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman state what is the object of this amendment?

Mr. ELLIS. Hitherto they have been obliged to pay $1,200 for a clerk. By this amendment if they can get one cheaper they may do so. That is all.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I desire to ask the attention of the gentleman having the bill in charge to this question. This is for the instruction, support, and civilization of the Navajo Indians. I ask the gentleman from Louisiana, would it not be better to appropriate part of this money for ascertaining the reservation of those Indians, so that there may be no conflict about the school-houses after they get them built? As I understand it, there is no settled boundary to the reservation on which these Navajo Indians should be located; and there is a contest going on at the present time with settlers, who are trying to take the best or better lands, as there are no best, away from the Indians themselves. I desire to know whether the committee has made any provision for ascertaining definitely the boundary of the reservation to which the Navajo Indians belong.

Mr. ELLIS. The gentleman will find a little further on in the bill that a general appropriation is made for the survey of Indian reservations.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I find on page 46 of the bill an appropriation of $50,000 "for survey and subdivision of Indian reservations," &c.

Mr. ELLIS. And a portion of that amount will undoubtedly be applied to the survey of the Navajo reservation.

Mr. KEIFER. I desire to say that I have prepared an amendment to make it obligatory on the Department to make a survey of this Navajo Indian reservation.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I think such an amendment will be necessary, for I have carefully examined the bill and do not find in it any provision for the survey of that reservation.

Mr. KEIFER. It is an amendment to the general clause, to be found on page 46 of the bill.

The amendment of Mr. ELLIS was then agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

For support and civilization of Joseph's Band of Nez Percé Indians in the Indian Territory, $15,000.

Mr. ELLIS. By instruction of the Committee on Appropriations, I move to amend the paragraph just read so as to increase the appropriation to $20,000. I will state that that increase is made at the request of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. The amount of the increase, $5,000, is to be subtracted from the amount named in the bill, in lines 925, 926, and 927, for the Yakamas. It merely changes the position of the appropriation from one item to another.

The Clerk read the following:

For subsistence and civilization of the Yakamas and other Indians at said agency, including pay of employés, $20,000.

Mr. ELLIS. By instructions of the committee, I move to amend by striking out "$20,000" and inserting "$15,000." The $5,000 taken from this item of appropriation is to meet the increase made in the item for Joseph's Band of Nez Percé Indians.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

FOR SUPPORT OF SCHOOLS.

For support of Indian day and industrial schools, and for other educational purposes not hereinafter provided for, for construction and repair of school buildings, and for purchase of cattle and sheep for schools, $400,000; and no portion of this sum, nor of any other sum appropriated by this act for the support of Indian schools, shall be paid for service rendered by any scholar taught in said schools during the period of his tuition, except for excess of value of labor over and above cost of tuition and support, or either, furnished by the Government.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out the word "day" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "boarding," so that it will read "for support of Indian boarding and industrial schools," &c. In this connection I ask the Clerk to read an extract I have marked from the report of the subcommittee of the special committee of the Senate appointed to visit the Indian tribes in Northern Montana.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is, after all, upon these boarding-schools on the reservations that we must depend for the civilization of the Indian. It is useless to expect any good results from the day-schools, no matter how earnest and honest may be the teachers. The Indians are, in their primitive condition, a restless, nomadic race, and they will not submit their children to the regular attendance and systematic study required by any day-school which can expect success. In our visit to the different tribes in Montana we did not find a single day-school which amounted to anything as a factor in educating the Indian children. The system is absolutely wrong from the foundation and can never be successful. In our opinion not another dollar should be thus wasted, but let the money now thrown away upon day-schools be devoted to industrial boarding-schools alone. Nor should this question be approached as a denominational one, or in the interest of one religious sect against another. The great and overwhelming question worthy the best intellect and highest endeavor of statesman and philanthropist is how to educate and civilize the Indian, and the bounty of the Government should go to that instrumentality, without regard to dogma or creed, which can best achieve the great result.

Mr. MAGINNIS. That report was prepared by Senator VEST, and was concurred in by Senator DAWES and I believe by the entire commission. We found that in all these day-schools the children who went one week would not go the next week, but would go off with their bands somewhere else. At the Crow agency, where we have expended for the last twenty years thousands and thousands of dollars for the education of the children, at the time of our visit we found but five students at the school.

At the Blackfeet agency we found that the only possible way to induce the children to attend the day-school was to have buckets of hard-tack, the contents of which were distributed to the children, and as soon as the buckets were emptied of the hard-tack the children would leave. The difference in the attendance at the school on the days when rations were issued and the days when rations were not issued was as the difference between 50 and 200.

We witnessed one very singular and strange instance of the way this matter works at the Crow agency. In order to induce the children to attend the school the teacher there made a distribution of sugar-candy. Very much to the surprise of the teacher one morning he found that the bucks of the tribe were occupying the children's seats, while the children had been driven away. I will ask the Clerk to read another extract from the report of the subcommittee to visit the Indian tribes in Montana. The extract refers to the Jesuit school, for that was the one visited; but it applies equally well to the schools conducted by other denominations.

The Clerk read as follows:

On September 8, after a pleasant journey of eighteen miles along the banks of the Jocko River, a tributary of the Columbia, we reached Saint Ignatius Mission, situated in a beautiful rolling country, and three miles from the base of the Mission Mountains. This mission was established by Father De Smet in 1852, and in 1861 was for a time abandoned, but in 1865 the Jesuits again opened the school, and it is now in a flourishing condition. The school has now one hundred scholars, about equally divided between the sexes, and the Government pays $100 annually for the board, tuition, and clothing of each scholar up to the number of eighty. The boys and girls are in separate houses, the former under a corps of five teachers, three fathers and two lay brothers, and the girls under three sisters and two half sisters, Father Van Gorp being at the head of the institution. The children are taught reading, writing, arithmetic, grammar, and geography, and their recitations, all in the English language, are equal to those of white children in the States of the same age.

The mission has a saw and grist mill, and planing and shingle machine, worked by the boys, several hundred head of cattle and horses, and three hundred acres of land belonging to the mission, cultivated successfully by the male scholars, the product being sufficient to furnish enough wheat, oats, and vegetables for all purposes. The girls are also taught by the sisters, besides the branches we have mentioned, music, sewing, embroidery, and housekeeping. For a time this school was only for females, and the result was that the young women, after being educated, married ignorant half-breeds or Indians, and, unable to withstand the ridicule of their companions, relapsed into a barbarism worse, if possible, than that of the husband and tribe. Now, after the establishment of the department for males, the young people when they leave school intermarry, and each couple becomes a nucleus for civilization and religion in the neighborhood where they make their home, the fathers and agent assisting them in building a house and preparing their little farm for raising a crop. Two excellent school-houses are now being erected, one with sixteen rooms, and a dormitory for fifty boys, and the other with twelve rooms for the female school, all the work on these houses being done by the Indian boys.

Mr. MAGINNIS. It was our deliberate judgment that every dollar which had been spent for the purpose of keeping up these day-schools for the Indian children might just as well have been sunk in the ocean. The only way to educate these children is to take the boys and girls and put them in boarding and industrial schools close to the reservations. One of the difficulties about the schools at Carlisle, Hampton, and other places is that the Indians are often unwilling to allow their children to go so far away from home. They are a very affectionate people, very much attached to their children, and are opposed to the idea of sending them away such a distance from them.

I believe if these industrial schools were established near the reservations, where the Indian boys and girls could go and be educated, be taught to work, be instructed in the mechanic arts, on the principle of the school referred to in the extract which the Clerk has just read, it would do a great deal of good. The system of day-schools I believe to be utterly and entirely worthless. Among the Pueblos and other settled Indians it may be that some good has resulted from such schools; but among the wild tribes I venture to say that you can not find a single scholar who in all the years we have been appropriating money for their education has been taught to read and write the English language.

Mr. ELLIS. I am sorry to disagree with my friend from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS], for I know he has had far more practical experience among the wild tribes of his Territory than I possibly could have had. But I do radically and totally disagree with him, not doubting in the slightest that he has correctly portrayed the condition of things in Montana Territory. But there are Indians outside of Montana; and I find among them one hundred and seventeen day-schools——

Mr. MAGINNIS. My remarks do not apply to any settled band of Indians.

Mr. ELLIS. This is a general appropriation for the support of day-schools among the Indians. I find there are one hundred and seventeen of these schools in operation among the Indian tribes. I find that twenty-three have been opened during the past year, and are in successful operation. I find that the day-school is a recruiting station for the boarding-school. I find that the influence of the teachers upon the families to which the Indian children belong is most excellent and admirable. For these reasons I believe that this provision for day-schools should be maintained. The day-school is, as it were, the reveille breaking upon the ear of these people and telling them that the day of education has come. I believe that the provision in the bill for the maintenance of these schools should be retained.

The amendment of Mr. MAGINNIS was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support of the industrial school near Arkansas City, $25,000; for building for employés at said school, $5,000; pay of superintendent of said school, $1,500; in all, $31,500.

Mr. ELLIS. By direction of the Committee on Appropriations, I move to amend by inserting after the word "dollars," where it first occurs in the paragraph just read, the words "and said sum shall be disbursed upon the basis of an allowance of $200 for the support and education of each scholar."

The committee are of opinion that an increase from $167 to $200 as the allowance per scholar is absolutely necessary. This change does not increase the aggregate amount of the appropriation at all.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support of Indian industrial school at Forest Grove, Oreg., $30,000; and said sum shall be disbursed upon the basis of an allowance of not exceeding $167 for the support and education of each scholar; pay of superintendent, $1,500; purchase of land and erection of buildings, $15,000; in all, $46,500.

Mr. ELLIS. In conformity with the amendment just adopted, and carrying out the same view, I move to amend by striking out, in line 963, the words "$167," and inserting "$200."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support of industrial school for Indians at Genoa, Nebr., $20,000; and said sum shall be disbursed upon the basis of an allowance of not exceeding $167 for the support and education of each scholar; pay of superintendent, $1,500; in all, $21,500.

Mr. ELLIS. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "$167" and inserting "$200."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and education of one hundred and twenty Indian children at the school at Hampton, Va., $19,000; transportation of children to and from said school, $2,500; in all, $21,500.

Mr. CHACE. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill why we should not raise the allowance per scholar for this school at Hampton, Va.

Mr. ELLIS. Because that school has a large charity support.

Mr. CHACE. That is to say, because the charitably disposed people of this country are willing to contribute their funds to support the wards of this nation, the Government should go on and let them do it.

Mr. ELLIS. The school at Hampton is a private institution, not a Government school.

Mr. CHACE. Very true; but everybody knows it is the best school in the whole lot.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I do not admit that

Mr. ELLIS. Nor do I admit it. In the second place, this school asks no more than the amount given in the bill; in the third place, it is not a Government school; in the fourth place, if charitable people are willing to help this poor Government, I am willing they should do it.

Mr. CHACE. They are not willing to do it in this way; they only do it because they consider it a matter of necessity.

Mr. RANDALL. Oh, no; the gentleman is mistaken; they take great pleasure in doing it.

Mr. CHACE. There are plenty of other charitable purposes for which they can employ their means.

Mr. ELLIS. I will state that there is another institution, the school at Philadelphia, that only asks $167 per scholar; the managers say they have funds from charitable sources and can get along with this allowance from the Government.

Mr. CHACE. The gentleman refers to the Lincoln school.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Those in charge of the mission school about which the Clerk read a while ago are willing to take all the children that may be sent there at $100 each.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Louisiana what has been the usual allowance made by the Government for the support of these Indian scholars.

Mr. ELLIS. The amount we have paid has never been more than $200 or less than $167. But it is found that when a school is supported entirely by the Government, $167 is not adequate. The schools that are now getting along or will get along in the future with an allowance of $167 for each scholar are supported partially by private charity. I refer to the Hampton school and the Lincoln institution at Philadelphia. After careful examination and earnest inquiry, the Committee on Appropriations arrived at the conclusion that in the case of the other schools an allowance of $200 per scholar is necessary. This includes clothing, support, and all that kind of thing.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and education of three hundred and forty children, at $167 per annum each, at the Indian school at Lawrence, Kans., $56,780; pay of superintendent of school, $1,500; teams, wagons, and farm implements for manual-labor school, $2,000; in all, $60,280.

Mr. ELLIS. The amendment which I now send to the desk is necessitated by the change made in the amount of the allowance from $167 to $200.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 41, in line 980, strike out the words "three hundred and forty" and in lieu thereof insert the words "two hundred and eighty-four."

In line 981, strike out the words "one hundred and sixty-seven" and in lieu thereof insert the words "two hundred."

In line 983, strike out the words "seven hundred and eighty" and in lieu thereof insert the words "eight hundred."

In line 984, strike out the words "one thousand five hundred" and in lieu thereof insert the words "two thousand."

In lines 986 and 987, strike out the words "two hundred and eighty" and in lieu thereof insert the words "eight hundred."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For care, support, and education of two hundred Indian children at Lincoln school, Philadelphia, Pa., at a rate not to exceed $167 per annum for each child, $33,400.

Mr. ELLIS. I move to strike out "school" and insert "institution," that being the charter name, "Lincoln Institution."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For care, support, and education of Indian children at industrial, agricultural, mechanical, or other schools, other than those herein provided for, in any of the States or Territories of the United States, at a rate not to exceed $167 for each child, $75,000; and of this amount not exceeding $5,000 may be used for the establishment and support of a boarding-school for the Pottawatomie Indians; and of said sum not exceeding $5,000 may be used for the transportation of Indian children to and from said schools, and also for the placing of children from all the Indian schools, with the consent of their parents, under the care and control of such suitable white families as may in all respects be qualified to give such children moral, industrial, and educational training, for a term of not less than three years, under arrangements in which their proper care, support, and education shall be in exchange for their labor.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I move to strike out the words "at a rate not to exceed $167 for each child, $75,000," and in lieu thereof to insert as follows: "at a rate not to exceed $200 for each child, $90,000."

It will be observed, Mr. Chairman, that this section places all these schools which are mainly occupied in the education of white children, in which a comparatively small number of Indian children are put with a comparatively large number of white children, upon the same footing. I desire for the committee to consider that for the same reasons stated by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS] a boarding-school is superior to a day-school; for the same reason a scholar at Carlisle is better than a scholar on a reservation; and so is a scholar where fifty Indian children are put with five hundred white children better for the purpose of industrial training and education than a scholar in a school devoted altogether to the training and education of Indian children.

That these institutions have not asked for $200 for each child may be true. They have not asked to take care of these Indian children. The Government has urged them to do so. Circulars have been issued by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and sent all over the country. Responses have not been made, because $167 is not enough.

I believe it is in the interest of the people that a considerable number of these children should be educated in this particular way. I believe the Government should offer a larger inducement than heretofore to have these Indian children taken into these industrial schools. It seems to me this $15,000 will be money as well invested as any the United States ever appropriated.

Mr. ELLIS. I have no objection to the adoption of the gentleman's amendment. I am not authorized to accept it, but I would concur in it. I see no reason why the appropriation should be increased $15,000. All the boarding-schools have been provided for already, and $75,000 is adequate for the purposes of the Department for the next year.

Mr. REAGAN. Do I understand the gentleman from Illinois to say a large number of white children as well as Indian children are provided for in this bill?

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. No, sir; what I have said is that Indian scholars in industrial schools where there are ten white children to one Indian child are more likely to be civilized and get a better education than in schools where the children are all Indians.

I accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Louisiana, and will leave the amount of $75,000 as it is in the bill. All I wish to do is to increase the rate from $167 to $200.

Mr. REAGAN. These Indian children are to be supported out of the appropriation under Indian treaties?

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Yes, sir; and the Government has been trying to get these industrial schools all over the country intended for the training and education of white children to take a limited number of Indian children.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask for a division on the amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 64, noes 19.

So the amendment as modified was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For this amount, for survey and subdivision of Indian reservations, and of lands to be allotted to Indians, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $50,000.

Mr. KEIFER. I move to add the following.

The Clerk read as follows:

And $5,000 of this sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be used for the survey and defining of the boundary of the Navajo agency.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, the agent of the Navajo Indians, who is a very intelligent man, appeared before the Committee on Appropriations, and I certainly state what I think was universally admitted by the committee, that he gave an exceedingly clear view of the condition of these Indians.

It turns out that this reservation has not been surveyed, and its limits are not well defined. The boundaries have not been fixed, and this people are constantly being encroached upon by white settlers, by people who are herding stock; and as a necessary result there are constant conflicts between the Indians and the settlers. It should be remembered that the Navajo Indians never ask the Government of the United States to give them support or supplies. They support themselves. They have their own herds, their own flocks of sheep. They work and toil, and are in no sense a burden upon the Government. They make blankets and sell them, and by their own labor supply all that they need for themselves. But they are in danger on every hand by the encroachments of the voracious people about them upon their reservation. It has become almost impossible to protect this tribe of Indians, so that it has become essential that there may be a barrier fixed, a line specified where the Government has power to check the encroachments of other settlers. It is necessary, therefore, to fix the limit of their reservation, and it is for this reason that this tribe, which you do not support in the ordinary way, in my judgment are entitled to have this special survey made. There are other surveys that ought to be made, but the general appropriation will probably cover them; and I think I express the view of the committee when I repeat that the boundaries of this reservation should be surveyed and defined at once.

Mr. ELLIS. I would like to hear the amendment again reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. ELLIS. I think that is right; I have no objection to it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I offer a substitute for the amendment in the following language:

For surveying and defining by fixed and marked stones the boundary of the Navajo Indian reservation as provided by article 2 of the treaty of June 1, 1868, to be expended under the direction of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey, or so much thereof as may be necessary, $5,000.

I am not particular about the work being done by the Coast and Geodetic Survey, nor have I any objection whatever to its being done by the Interior Department; but I offer this for the simple reason that the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey have already triangulated that portion of the country, and by the second article of the treaty of June 1, 1868, with the Indians it is declared:

The United States agrees that the following district of country, to wit: bounded on the north by the thirty-seventh degree of north latitude, south by an east-and-west line passing through the site of old Fort Defiance, in Cañon Bonito, east by the parallel of longitude which if prolonged south would pass through old Fort Lyon, or the Ojo-de-oso Bear Spring, and west by a parallel of longitude about 109° 30′ west of Greenwich, provided it embraces the outlet of the Cañon de Chilly, which cañon is to be all included in this reservation, shall be, and the same is hereby, set apart for the use and occupation of the Navajo tribe of Indians, and for such other friendly tribes or individual Indians as from time to time they may be willing, with the consent of the United States, to admit among them; and the United States agrees that no persons except those herein so authorized to do, and except such officers, soldiers, agents, and employés of the Government or of the Indians as may be authorized to enter upon Indian reservations in discharge of duties imposed by law or the orders of the President, shall ever be permitted to pass over, settle upon, or reside in the territory described in this article.

Now, it will be observed by the committee that the degrees of latitude and longitude defining the boundaries of this reservation will be more readily ascertained from the surveys already made by the Coast Survey than by any other mode of doing the work, and if it has been already done in part by them, let them go forward and complete the work. Besides, the ordinary surveyor is not supposed to understand triangulation, while the Coast and Geodetic Survey not only understands it, but they have been at work already in that country; and with the lines already run by them one-tenth of the money to be expended by the Land Office will complete the work. I offer the amendment, therefore, in the line of economy, the Coast Survey having already done a large part of the work. Not that I am unwilling, sir, to trust the Land Office at all; but having done that work, I think they may properly continue it. If this amendment shall be adopted, I desire to say further that in accordance with the treaty of June 1, 1868, with this tribe of Indians, whereby among other things we obligated this nation to pay them $150,000, yet only $40,000 of which is appropriated by this bill, we should, therefore, go on and subdivide their lands into sections and quarter-sections, and then the gentleman from Ohio can offer his amendment to that end. That properly comes under the Land Office to subdivide their lands into sections and quarter-sections in order that—and I read now from the treaty—

Any person over 18 years of age, not being the head of a family, may in like manner select and cause to be certified to him or her, for purposes of cultivation, a quantity of land not exceeding eighty acres in extent, and thereupon be entitled to the exclusive possession of the same as above directed.

Until the subdivisions are made it is impossible to comply with that part of our treaty with the Indians.

By another clause of this treaty we are under an obligation, as I have already said, to appropriate $150,000 to carry it into effect. Now in this bill, as I have also said, only $40,000 are appropriated. That band of Indians who make and sell blankets, that work like people here among ourselves, living on the poorest land, I am told, in all of New Mexico, with a very few acres out of the many thousands in their boundary when it shall be ascertained that can be cultivated, digging a poor subsistence out of that miserable soil, are unable to tell which is their home. The agent there, who has to deal with and settle questions that may arise between the Indians themselves or between them and the people who encroach upon them, is unable to say where the boundary lines of their lands begin or cease. I hope, therefore, that the substitute will be adopted.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to call the attention of my friend from Kentucky to one feature of the discretion of the Secretary which his amendment would destroy if adopted in the present language. The present reservation is insufficient for these bands of Indians. It is contemplated to add a large portion of territory westerly and easterly of the reservation as now existing. If this amendment is adopted it would restrict the survey to the treaty of 1868. It is contemplated, I think, by the Indian Office, and is at all events recommended by the Indian agent, to add a large territory to the Indian reservation. If this amendment is adopted it would cut that off. If it is left, in general language the Secretary would be authorized to mark the boundary, as we hope it will be finally arranged. I trust the gentleman will withdraw that part of his amendment.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I would have no objection to withdrawing my amendment if I thought that would help matters at all. But here is the treaty made in 1868. Already some outrages have occurred there. This has not arisen from the bad disposition of the Indians on the one hand or the recklessness of the whites on the other. It has been because of the uncertainty of the boundary. Ten years ago that land was not considered of sufficient value to induce any white man to go there. But there are portions of it now found to be valuable. The difficulty is as to obtaining water. The Indians who are there can not get good water to drink. At the agency, which is the most favored spot in the reservation, they can not get good water to drink. What I ask is that the present reservation shall be surveyed.

Mr. CALKINS. Let me say to the gentleman from Kentucky that it is for the purpose of extending the reservation of these Indians down water courses, so that they may get more water, that I ask him to withdraw his substitute.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. It is for the purposes of the men who are there troubling the Indians.

Mr. CALKINS. Oh, no; this was recommended by the Indian agent, who impressed himself on the committee and on every one with whom he came in contact as one of the best and most valuable men in the service of the Indian Department.

Mr. KEIFER. I think we ought to make no mistake about this matter. The proposed substitute would simply limit this to carry out the provisions of an old treaty and it is not proposed to do that at all. There have been negotiations going on with a view to adding certain portions of country west and south so as to give the Indians the advantage of land where they can drive their herds and get water. Some propositions have been made and considered with reference to damming the cañon so as to provide water that can be used for irrigating purposes, for the purposes of the Indians alone. They have very little water that can be utilized for that purpose, and they are often in very great straits to raise any sort of vegetables at all. They have to live upon mutton most of the year round. They have no game, but they have large herds of sheep, on which they live, and they have not asked the Government to give them anything.

The Government proposes to be very liberal and to give them in that very poor country the very best land that is there. What I object to in the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kentucky is that it would so restrict the Department that they could not do justice to these Navajo Indians.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman tell me where there is any such proposition or any such bill pending before a committee? Here, on the other hand, is an agreement signed by the Government and the chiefs of the tribe ten years ago.

Mr. CALKINS. I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that the Indian agent has recommended this measure to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the Commissioner has called attention to it. The Secretary of the Interior in his report has submitted it, and it is now before the House for consideration.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Is not the Indian agent asking for this survey?

Mr. CALKINS. The Indian agent wants the survey, and wants it as I have stated it. It is to be hoped that in this matter everybody will yield to the suggestions of the Indian Department.

Mr. STEVENS. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEVENS. This colloquial discussion may be very interesting to the gentlemen who take part in it and might be very useful to us if we could hear it. But the gentlemen seem to be discussing the matter among themselves without any reference to the rest of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken. But the Chair will say that it has no practical application now, as the colloquy seems to be finished. [Laughter.] The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] for the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER]. The question will first be taken on the substitute.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask that it be again read for the information of the committee.

Objection was made.

The question being taken on the proposed substitute, it was not agreed to.

The question being taken on the amendment proposed by Mr. KEIFER, it was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I offer as an amendment, to follow the amendment just adopted, what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the subdivision of the Navajo Indian reservation into sections and quarter-sections and defining the same by marked corners, $10,000.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment for the reasons which I shall proceed to state. I desire to call the attention of the committee again to this treaty with the Navajo Indians of the 1st June, 1868.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order on the amendment that it is new legislation and does not retrench expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana insist on the point of order now, or does he reserve it until the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] shall have been heard in explanation of his amendment?

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserve the point of order for the present.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Article 11 of the treaty with the Navajoes provides:

The Navajoes also hereby agree that at any time after the signing of these presents they will proceed in such manner as may be required of them by the agent, or by the officer charged with their removal, to the reservation herein provided for, the United States paying for their subsistence en route, and providing a reasonable amount of transportation for the sick and feeble.

In article 5 of the same treaty is the following:

Any person over 18 years of age, not being the head of a family, may in like manner select, and cause to be certified to him or her for purposes of cultivation, a quantity of land not exceeding eighty acres in extent, and thereupon be entitled to the exclusive possession of the same as above directed.

I know that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will make the point that this amendment does not reduce expenditures. But I call his attention to the fact that $150,000 is due to this tribe of Indians. If that is so, then the sooner we survey their reservation, for which the Committee of the Whole, by adopting the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER], has appropriated $5,000 to survey the outside boundaries of the reservation, the sooner we can appropriate a part of this $150,000 which we owe these Indians for the purpose of subdividing the reservation into sections and subsections, the sooner will we enable these families who can make blankets, who know how to work as civilized people do, to make suitable provision for their support and maintenance. This tribe of Indians is as orderly and well-behaved as any civilized community. It is but a matter of simple justice to survey their reservation, so that they can find their sections and quarter-sections of land.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Many MEMBERS. Vote, vote.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a point of order pending, submitted by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order that this is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would inquire for information if it changes any existing law?

Mr. HOLMAN. It is not authorized by any existing law.

Mr. KEIFER. It is authorized by treaty.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I desire to be heard on that point of order. I suppose the gentleman from Indiana is a lawyer and will rely on the laws of our country, and the treaty with these Indians is a part of the law.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I think it is well enough to withdraw it.

Mr. KEIFER. One moment. I wish to say that, as I understand, the Navajo Indians do not wish this subdivision of their lands because they can not occupy their lands by allotment as other Indians do.

These Indians live in villages; they have their herds, and drive them where they can obtain feed and water for them. They could not live on quarter-sections of land if allotted to them, for they would be, in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred, without water and without any place to go to get it. They have now to go out on the plains where there is no water. They have adopted their own method of dividing their lands. They live in villages, and if the Government should require them to do what this amendment proposes, to live on allotments, they would not be able to support themselves.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

For detecting and prosecuting persons who sell or barter, or donate or furnish in any manner whatsoever, liquors, wines, beer, or any intoxicating beverage whatsoever to Indians upon or belonging to any Indian reservation, $5,000. And section 2139 of the Revised Statutes be, and is hereby, amended by striking out all after the word "dollars" in the eighth line of said section; and section 2140 of the Revised Statutes be, and is hereby, amended by striking out all after the word "country," in the sixteenth line, down to and including the word "Department," in the seventeenth line.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I make the point of order on the last clause of that paragraph, that it changes existing law and does not reduce expenditures. I think the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] is quite willing that the clause shall go out of the bill if an amendment which I have prepared is adopted.

The clause referred to by Mr. MAGINNIS was as follows:

And section 2139 of the Revised Statutes be, and is hereby, amended by striking out all after the word "dollars," in the eighth line of said section; and section 2140 of the Revised Statutes be, and is hereby, amended by striking out all after the word "country," in the sixteenth line, down to and including the word "Department," in the seventeenth line.

Mr. ELLIS. I think the point of order should be sustained, and I am willing that the clause shall be ruled out and the amendment prepared by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS] adopted in its place.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and rules the clause referred to out of order.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I now move to amend by inserting, after the words "upon or belonging to any Indian reservation, $5,000," that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

And no part of section 2139 or of section 2140 of the Revised Statutes shall be a bar to the prosecution of any officer, soldier, attaché, or employé of the Army of the United States who shall barter, donate, or furnish in any manner whatsoever liquors, wines, beer, or any intoxicating beverage whatever to any Indian.

Mr. CALKINS. I suggest to the gentleman from Montana [Mr.

MAGINNIS] to insert in his amendment the words "sutler or storekeeper" after the word "soldier."

Mr. MAGINNIS. That is right, and I modify my amendment as suggested.

Mr. BUDD. I move to amend the amendment by adding to it that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Any act which when done by a citizen of the United States would be a crime shall be, and is hereby declared, equally a crime when done by any Indian upon or belonging to any Indian reservation; and such Indian committing such crime shall be subject to the same jurisdiction and amenable to the same process as any citizen would be in like case. And no Department or officer of the United States of America shall have or exercise power or authority to shield or protect such Indian criminal from just punishment, nor shall any money herein or hereby appropriated be used for that purpose or to that end.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I would suggest to the gentleman from California [Mr. BUDD] that it would be better for him to withhold his amendment until the one I have offered shall have been acted on, and then offer it as an independent proposition.

Mr. BUDD. I will accept the suggestion, and withdraw my amendment for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS] which has been read by the Clerk.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. MAGINNIS, and it was agreed to.

Mr. BUDD. I now offer the amendment which has been already read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purpose of constructing irrigating ditches at Indian agencies, $50,000.

Mr. VALENTINE. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. MILLS. I hope the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] will consent now that the committee rise. It is 5 o'clock.

Mr. ELLIS. I did hope we should get through the bill to-night; but I see that the committee is getting restless, and, at the request of many gentlemen, I move that the committee rise.

Mr. VALENTINE. Let my amendment be read and be considered as pending.

Mr. ELLIS. Very well.

Insert after the pending paragraph the following:

For construction of bridges on the Santee-Sioux Indian reservation in Nebraska and the Ponca Indian reservation in the Territory of Dakota, $12,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be immediately available.

Mr. ELLIS. I now renew my motion that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WELLBORN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6092) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 1027) for the relief of James W. Woodard; and

A bill (S. 1819) to print certain eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Thomas Allen.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. BUDD, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD remarks on the Indian appropriation bill.

To Mr. BEACH, for three days, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. BARR, for one week, from April 7.

To Mr. WORTHINGTON, for ten days from to-day, on account of important business.

PLANS FOR CONGRESSIONAL LIBRARY.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to offer for immediate consideration the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be directed to cause to be printed, for the information of members of the House, 500 copies of a description of the plans for a new Congressional Library building, referred to in Senate bill 1139, which was made a special order for April 3.

Mr. HOLMAN. What will be the probable expense of this printing?

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I have seen these plans; they cover five or six pages of printed matter. I think the cost will be but trifling.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and adopted.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMPROVEMENT OF OHIO RIVER.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6414) appropriating $75,000 for the protection of the Government property and communication with said property, and the improvement of the Ohio River at Jeffersonville, Ind.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

SOLDIERS' BOUNTIES.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER, by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill (H. R. 6415) to equalize the bounties of soldiers of the United States who served in the late war to suppress the rebellion; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Select Committee on Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, April 4, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

OHIO MUSTER-ROLLS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the joint resolution (H. Res. 210) requiring the Secretary of War to furnish copies of certain muster-rolls to the governor of the State of Ohio.

This joint resolution having passed both Houses, the Chair will state, was enrolled and signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives and by the President pro tempore of the Senate, but the signature to the enrolled bill here has not yet been announced. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] not now in his seat entered a motion to reconsider, and the House was requested to return the resolution, which has been done. The Chair thinks that it is his duty to inform the Senate that before the motion to reconsider was made he had signed but not announced the signature of the enrolled resolution, and it is not yet announced. The rules seem to provide that it is the duty of the Chair on signing an enrolled bill to see that it is delivered to the Committee on Enrolled Bills for presentation to the President; but the Chair thinks that the proper construction of the spirit of the rule is that if a motion to reconsider be entered in time, as it was in this case, to withhold the announcing of the signature and to leave the enrolled bill to await the determination of the Senate on the motion to reconsider. If there be no objection, therefore, the joint resolution, with the motion to reconsider, will be placed on the Calendar, and the signature of the enrolled resolution will not be announced.

Mr. HARRIS. Would not the better course be to let the bill lie on the table awaiting action on the motion to reconsider, subject to be called up by the Senator entering the motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will stand on the Calendar, together with the motion to reconsider, and can be moved at any time in the morning hour after resolutions are through, or after the morning hour, on motion, under the ninth rule. It does not seem, in the opinion of the Chair, to put it at a disadvantage to place it on the Calendar, as other motions to reconsider bills are. The Chair will receive a motion to lay it on the table if the Senator from Tennessee prefers.

Mr. HARRIS. No; I do not see, under the view expressed by the Chair, that there is really any difference. It is subject to the call of the Senator who entered the motion in either position.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Ordnance relative to the case of Wilhelm Tegethoff, a disabled skilled workman recently employed at the Springfield armory; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BAYARD presented a memorial of H. B. Caverly and other citizens of New York, remonstrating against the passage of any law to receive trade-dollars other than at their market value as bullion; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of S. P. Powles and 222 other citizens and business firms of New York city, praying for the suspension of the coinage of the standard silver dollar; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GORMAN presented the petition of Professor M. A. Newell, Maryland State superintendent of public instruction, Henry A. Wise, superintendent of Baltimore (Md.) city schools, and the members of the Baltimore city school board, praying for the passage of the bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ALLISON. I present a petition of citizens of Iowa, praying that a pension be granted to David Galbraith, Nelson D. Bates, and William Ross Wallace. The petition describes in detail the military service of these three persons. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON presented the petition of N. B. Howard Post, No. 92, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Iowa, praying for an amendment of the pension laws; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of Dubuque, Iowa, against the proposed repeal of the law authorizing the manufacture of vinegar by the vaporizing process; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of H. H. Field and other citizens of Iowa, praying for the passage of the bill granting pensions to those who served in the United States Army during the war with Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of Anna Ginn, of Kirkville, Iowa, praying for the passage of an act granting to her a pension on account of the death of her husband from disease contracted in the military service during the war of the rebellion; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SEWELL presented a statement relative to the United States powder depot at Dover, N. J., prepared by Maj. J. P. Farley, United States Army, showing the necessity for an additional appropriation for that work; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I present the petition of Miss Herrmine Thomson, of California, praying that she be permitted to preempt one hundred and twenty acres of land within the reservation at Camp Independence, California. This is a young girl 18 years old, the daughter of a deceased soldier, who served in the Army of the United States for twenty years, including the late war. He died from the effects of wounds received in the late war, and was buried on the land which she desires to take up as a home, and I hope the Committee on Military Affairs, to which I move that the petition be referred, will give this matter careful attention.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN presented a petition of a large number of soldiers in the late war in favor of the passage of Senate bill 1028, to equalize the bounties of soldiers who served in the late war for the Union; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. VOORHEES presented resolutions adopted by Hall Samuel Simmson Post, No. 226, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Indiana, Charleston, Ind., favoring certain legislation in behalf of ex-Union soldiers; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL. I present a memorial of the Commercial Exchange of Philadelphia, in favor of the redemption or legalization of the trade-dollar, which I move be referred to the Committee on Finance.

In this connection, if I may be permitted a single remark, I desire to present what to me are interesting figures collected by a member of Congress from my State in relation to the number of trade-dollars held in that State. He addressed letters to all the bankers and depositaries of money, and generally circulated through the press of the State inquiries in relation to the subject. The result of his inquiries in answer to those letters is that banks, bankers, and trust companies hold at par in that State $796,749 of these dollars; private individuals and societies hold $1,641,134; and at a discount from 10 to 15 per cent. in all by the banks and by private individuals there are held $123,044.

I simply desire to say that so far as my State is concerned there is very great anxiety that there should be some relief on this subject; but at the same time I think the public opinion of my State will be very strongly against the enactment of such a law as the proposed measure which has come to the Senate from the House if it shall result in an increase of the silver coinage, but that it will be far wiser at this time at least to proceed as far in the settlement of this question as to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury in his discretion to suspend that coinage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COKE presented the petition of Catherine B. Arnold, widow of Maj. Ripley A. Arnold, late major, Second Regiment United States Dragoons, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DOLPH presented the petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Tacoma, Wash., praying for the passage of the bill making that place a port of entry; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present the affidavits of William Lockhart, Daniel Steele, Dr. Louis H. Westerly, and the joint affidavit of Elijah Price, Wiley Cope, and E. H. Brant, a letter from the Adjutant-General dated December 17, 1883, and a letter from the Second Auditor dated December 15, 1883, to accompany the bill (S. 517) granting a pension to William Lockhart. I trust the Committee on Pensions will give early and favorable consideration to the bill. This is all new evidence and is now submitted for the first time. I move the reference of the papers to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I present resolutions adopted by the Board of Trade of Chicago, Ill., expressing their opinion that the continued coinage of silver dollars is opposed to sound financial policy and is consequently subversive of the highest commercial interests of this country, and asking that authority be given to the President to appoint a committee for the purpose of examining into certain questions in reference thereto. I move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN presented a petition of Miles Carroll Post, No. 111, of the Department of Missouri, Grand Army of the Republic, praying for certain legislation in favor of ex-Union soldiers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Curtis Post, No. 84, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Missouri, praying for general legislation favorable to ex-soldiers of the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of Quincy, Ill., protesting against the passage of the patent-right bill now pending in the Senate; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented resolutions of Coblentz Post, No. 272, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Illinois, indorsing the recommendations of the pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic in regard to pensions for Union soldiers; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a memorial of the Chicago Trade and Labor Assembly, protesting against the repeal of the present patent laws and against passing any law to contract the currency; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented a memorial of manufacturers of Sterling, Ill., remonstrating against the passage of Senate bill No. 1115 and House bill No. 3925, amendatory of the patent laws; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 774) for the relief of Melissa G. Polar, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

EXPORT-TRADE COMPILATION.

Mr. GORMAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 193) to provide for printing certain documents relating to customs revenues and domestic exports for the use of Congress, to report it with sundry amendments, and I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be treated as read in Committee of the Whole if there be no objection, and the first amendment reported from the Committee on Printing will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of line 4, in section 1, after the word "thousand," it is proposed to strike out the word "two" and insert "seven;" and in line 7 to strike out the word "Senate" and insert "said;" so as to make the section read:

That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to print, for the use of Congress, 4,700 copies of Senate Miscellaneous Document No. 46, first session Forty-sixth Congress, with additional data, to be furnished by the compiler of said document, showing the imports for the fiscal years ended June 30, 1879, 1880, 1881, 1882, and 1883, and a compilation of exports the growth, produce, and manufacture of the United States from 1789 to 1883, inclusive (ninety-four years), in which the quantity, value, and value per unit of quantity of each article are given by fiscal years and decades; also the value exported to each country and value from each State, with other additional data, prepared by Charles H. Evans, of the Treasury Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 4, before the word "copies," to strike out "one thousand" and insert "fifteen hundred;" in line 5, after the word "Senate," to strike out the words "fifty for the House library, fifty for the Senate library, fifty for the Congressional Library, fifty" and insert in lieu thereof the words "one hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

That the documents described in the foregoing section be stitched and bound as one volume; that 3,000 copies of the same be for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,500 copies for the use of the Senate, 100 for Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. Before that amendment is agreed to I should like to know exactly the proportion of these documents that is allotted to the Senate and to the House. I may wish to offer an amendment. The Senator from Maryland can explain it.

Mr. GORMAN. The number allotted to the House is 3,000, and to the Senate 1,500.

Mr. HAWLEY. The usual way.

Mr. GORMAN. The usual way.

Mr. COCKRELL. If that is the way, I have nothing further to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As amended the joint resolution provides for 3,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,500 for the use of the Senate, and 100 for the Ways and Means Committee, and 100 for the Senate Committee on Finance by a subsequent amendment. The question is on agreeing to amendment last reported.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Printing was, at the end of line 7, section 2, to add the words "and one hundred for the Senate Committee on Finance."

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GORMAN subsequently said: I ask unanimous consent to correct a verbal mistake in the joint resolution just passed by inserting the word "of" before "the" in the twelfth line of the first section. It is a mere typographical error.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland asks unanimous consent to correct the phraseology of the joint resolution just passed by inserting the word "of" after the word "exports," in line 12, so as to read: "and a compilation of exports of the growth, produce," &c. If there be no objection this correction of the phraseology will be considered as agreed to. The Chair hears no objection, and it is agreed to.

CONGO COUNTRY IN AFRICA.

Mr. GORMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report favorably the following resolution:

Resolved, That 1,000 additional copies of Senate report No. 393 of the present session, together with document entitled "Africa No. 3," be printed for the use of the Senate.

I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. ALLISON. What is the document?

Mr. GORMAN. I will state to the Senator from Iowa that it is a report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, made at this session, on the Congo country in Africa. Only the ordinary number was printed, and the copies are all exhausted.

Mr. ALLISON. All right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. JONAS introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 78) making an appropriation of $100,000 for the protection of existing levees on the lower Mississippi River; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River.

Mr. JONAS. In this connection I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. ALLISON] to a motion which I think he intended to make.

Mr. ALLISON. I did intend to make a motion with reference to the message of the President upon this subject which was yesterday referred to the Committee on Appropriations. The message itself has been sent to the Public Printer, and therefore is not yet in the possession of the Committee on Appropriations, but such subjects have never been considered by that committee. In looking the matter over I find that a million dollars was appropriated a month or perhaps six weeks ago for the Mississippi River improvement, including perhaps levees, and the Committee on Commerce or the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River had charge of that bill. I do not know its condition. I suggest, therefore, if it is in order, that the message of the President take the same direction that the bill just introduced has taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Committee on Appropriations be discharged from the further consideration of the message of the President of the United States on the subject of the bill just introduced, and that the message, with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River. That order will be entered, if there be no objection.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

Mr. VOORHEES. A few days ago I obtained an order from the Senate to withdraw certain papers that I supposed were on the files of the Senate. I find that they are in the Committee on Private Land Claims. I ask the following order, in order to enable the claimant to obtain the papers from the clerk of that committee:

Ordered, That the Committee on Private Land Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the petition and papers of Jessie Benton Frémont, and that she have leave to withdraw the same from the files of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be granted, subject to the rules.

OHIO MUSTER-ROLLS.

Mr. COCKRELL. Day before yesterday I entered a motion to reconsider the action of the Senate in passing the joint resolution (H. Res. 210) requiring the Secretary of War to furnish copies of certain muster-rolls to the governor of the State of Ohio, and accompanied that motion with a request to the House of Representatives to return the joint resolution to the Senate. The House has returned the joint resolution to the Senate, and I now ask that the motion to reconsider be agreed to, and that the resolution be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs. Neither Senator from Ohio objects to this, I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri moves that the vote of the Senate passing the joint resolution indicated by him be reconsidered. The question is on agreeing to the motion to reconsider.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs. That order will be entered, if there be no objection.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 223) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the mayor of Richmond, Va., a certain amount of flags and bunting for use at a fair, was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood that the Senator from Virginia desired to call the attention of the Senate to this joint resolution.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I am obliged to the Chair, but I have no wish to express about it. Let it be referred to the appropriate committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had yesterday approved and signed the act (S. 74) to enable the State of Colorado to take lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections found to be mineral lands, and to secure to the State of Colorado the benefit of the act of July 2, 1862, entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts."

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolutions," that order is closed. The Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar under the eighth rule.

Mr. BLAIR. I desire to move at this time to proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, being the educational bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The motion was agreed to, there being on a division—ayes 39, noes 4; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. PLUMB to recommit the bill to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, it was my intention originally upon the introduction of this bill to content myself with voting silently upon it, but the debate which has progressed has disclosed to me more and more the interest and the importance of the measure.

Not only have I been deeply impressed by the practical importance of some measure of relief to large and populous sections of this country, but just in proportion as the importance and extent of that relief have been impressed upon my mind has grown the necessity for finding a justification for my support of it.

Overstatement of any proposition is never wise, and to deal in superlatives of language is only to weaken really a strong feeling. But I do not think I can be mistaken in thinking that seldom has a measure been brought before Congress that would be fraught with more profound results upon the practical workings of the form of government under which we live than that which is now pending for our consideration.

It is a proposition to exercise the taxing power of the Government of the United States for a term of years in aid of the education of the people of the respective States; in other words, to assume not only an interest, but an interest coupled with conditional powers, over the common-school system of the various communities of this country, the States of the Union. The condition under which the money is to be appropriated is the proportion of ignorant classes. Where education is more prevalent and ignorance less dense the appropriation is to be less, and where illiteracy, as it is termed (I suppose as a synonym for ignorance), exists, there more is to be expended; so that it is an appropriation based upon a condition controlled by the discretion of the General Government.

It is always right to seek to understand truly the effect, the necessary consequences that await our action; and never is it more essential than where we are exercising not our own individual rights and powers but acting as representative men executing the great trust of public power, and executing it, as we all do in this country, under the limitations of a written charter to which we are not only bound by civil penalties but by those of religion superadded.

In a public newspaper of large influence, ably and intelligently conducted, of which one of the proprietors, and perhaps one of the editors, is one of our most honored associates in this body, I mean the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY], I find a careful editorial on the subject of this bill which I commend to the consideration of the Senate. After discussing the Blair bill, as it is called, after the distinguished Senator who presents it for the consideration of the Senate, the writer says:

The more honest, as the more truthful way of putting it would perhaps be to say that the necessity has arisen from the exercise of ultra-constitutional but necessary authority, and that it is a logical consequence of the emancipation and enfranchisement of the negro, these being the inevitable results of the war of the rebellion.

It is not at all irrelevant, however, to inquire whether the means will secure the end. The committee finds that five-twelfths of the school population of the country are growing up in ignorance of the English alphabet; that in eighty-six cities, containing a school population of over 2,000,000, over one-third of the children never enter a school-room. New York city has 114,000 children not enrolled at all, and of a school population of 385,000, there is an average attendance of only 132,000. Some of our New England villages exhibit statistics which are simply appalling. The South excuses herself on account of emancipation and poverty; the North explains herself by the inundation of a foreign population. Whatever the causes, and they are clear enough, the facts are to be admitted and faced. The prevailing sentiment is, that the State shall no longer be responsible for the education of her children, but they shall be educated by the National Government, the State doing so much as Congress shall require. This is to be understood, however, when the Federal Government undertakes this business, as of right and duty it has assumed, and the States have conceded that it has full and sovereign authority. It will be bound to look out for the "general welfare" in this behalf, according to its best judgment and highest wisdom. The schools must conform to its idea of virtue and its standard of education.

Mr. President, I concur in the result stated by this writer. I say nothing of the statistics of ignorance presented for I am disposed to think that in regard to them there is inaccuracy. I do not believe that the number of children who receive careful education in the homes of their parents, the best place they could receive it, or children who attend select schools paid for from private funds, are excluded from this great mass of alleged illiterates. In that respect I am disposed to believe the figures produced by the committee are more alarming than in truth they ought to be.

But I believe that the logical results of this bill, should it become a law, are fairly stated, and that if those who consider that it is wise and right, that it is justifiable in them as members of the Government and subject to the oath to support the Constitution, if they shall consider it wise and right to accept this appropriation in the form and manner in which it has been tendered, let them consider fairly that it is done in disregard of that mode of preserving liberty and promoting the general welfare, which was ordained by the founders of this Government in the charter which they have left for our guidance.

Mr. President, it may be pardoned if I speak of my personal feeling in connection with this subject. Never before was the conflict between inclination and the sense of duty so severe with me as now. The great fact grows upon my mind as I live under this Government, that only by the higher qualities of humanity can it be maintained; by the virtue, the self-control and intelligence of the citizens alone, can we expect the blessings of liberty shall be secured to us and to our posterity. This subject of education, what Emerson called "the miracle of intellectual enlargement," has been treated with force and eloquence by men in this Chamber who possess my affection and command my respect. The impression made upon me by the speech of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON], I may say of both the Senators from South Carolina, of the Senators from Mississippi, of the Senator who has charge of this bill [Mr. BLAIR] and who by his earnestness and straightforwardness has gained my respect for his attitude in regard to the entire subject; the statements read here from such men as Dr. Mayo, as my honored friend, Dr. Curry, and from the superintendent of State instruction of Indiana—all of these speeches and statements have impressed me profoundly, and have impelled me to the strictest self-examination of my grounds of dissent; and therefore I have felt bound in what our forefathers called "a decent respect for the opinions of mankind," to state the reasons why I do not feel justified in voting to aid public education in the States in the way now proposed.

Mr. President, I comprehend the condition of the South. It has so happened that since I became a member of this body I have been, until the present session, assigned to duty upon every committee connected with the investigation of their internal affairs. It was commenced in 1871 in the State of North Carolina and rapidly extended over every State south of the Potomac River. I have gone among those people and visited their homes and cities. I have heard the inmost history of their domestic affairs brought forward by a multitude of witnesses. I have realized in my heart and by my mind the extent of their material loss by the war, the flower of their manhood slain, their strong men and warriors crippled, the desolation of their homes and cities, the upheaval of their social system, the absolute wiping out of all forms of property in the shape of credit. All these were surely enough to prostrate and annihilate the strongest and the bravest. But there was one thing worse than all, there was one cause more devastating than all, and that was that after this plowshare of desolation had passed over that land, and just at the moment when every self-governing agency that law could supply was most needed for their protection, it was the unhappy policy, it was the most unfortunate decree of the party then controlling the Federal Government, absolutely to interdict and prohibit every vestige of local self-government throughout that entire region. Sir, it was in that hour of extremest peril, when the spirit of law that alone was left to survive that terrible period was then most needed to teach men self-control and self-respect, when it was most needed to protect the fragment of property that was left, and most needed to exercise American citizens in the practice and duties of local self-government, that by military decree it was annihilated and absolutely wiped out of existence. I cite it not for the purpose of reproach, not for the purpose of crimination, but I cite it as part of the truth of history, and because it has created a condition of things to which I have turned with the deepest anxiety, and in the face of which I have felt at times almost hopeless.

Why, Mr. President, the earlier traditions of the Southern States of our country are the common glory of us all. The name of Washington ever will be the watchword of American liberty and the password to every American heart. The roll of heroes of that portion of our country is long and lustrous with the very highest virtues that attach to our nature; and if it were needed that new testimony should be brought of the courage and the virtue of the men of the Southern States, I could call no better witnesses nor could I call more willing witnesses than those who confronted them for four years upon the battlefields of the war of secession, and many of whom I am glad to say are our honored associates in this Chamber.

But, sir, I believe that history will place the achievements of the Southern men and Southern women in adversity since the war as their highest title to the respect, the affection, the confidence, the sympathy of good men and good women everywhere. When the great military leader of the South laid down his arms and surrendered all but his honor, his counsel to his brethren in arms was worthy of himself: "Gentlemen, we must now cultivate our virtues;" and these words have sunk into the hearts and minds of his countrymen, and the growth of the South toward prosperity; her advance in the arts of peace and civilization has been absolutely marvelous, considering all the adverse circumstances in which she was struggling and which have combined at almost every step to prevent her onward progress.

Mr. President, I came into this Chamber but a few years after the war had nominally closed, and my main object in coming into public life was to assist in binding up the wounds of civil war in my country, and in the restoration of all the States to their proper position of equality in the Union To that end I have opposed steadily every measure that I deemed unequal and unjust, and I have not hesitated to denounce every act of unjustified power by the Executive or by Congress where I thought it tended to the inequality of the citizens of the Union or of the States of the Union before that law whose chief glory was that all men stood equal before it. In all this I have sought to do my full duty to the South as to my brethren and my fellow-countrymen. I have been in this Chamber when not a single true representative of the interests and the opinions and the sympathies of the Southern people was found in the Chamber as a representative from the Southern States, and when the representation so called was in truth a scandalous misrepresentation, which was the result of revolution and confusion. Now the case is different. Every State has now its chosen representative. They can speak and vote as they deem best. The current of a large public opinion has risen too high for the narrowness of party hate further to assert itself, and propositions for the overthrow of States and of Legislatures, which were abundant and common here a few years ago, are now not even suggested, and should only be remembered for the purpose of warning against their recurrence.

Sir, I am grateful to God that the day has come; and yet my theory of the Government of this Union remains still unchanged. It is a union of equal States, what Mr. Madison called the compound Republic of America. I am opposed to the domination of any State or any section, as much as I ever was to the oppression of any State or any section; and the love or the mistaken sympathy for none will ever tempt me knowingly to invade the harmony of our political system.

In this view let me inquire does this bill invade the harmony of our political system? Does it transcend the powers given to Congress to lay taxes? Does it invade and occupy that field of self-exertion which I think it must be conceded remains unimpaired in the States in regard to this most intimate and important function that a community can exercise toward the individuals that compose it?

I do not propose here to discuss what is the power of a community untrammeled by a written constitution to interpose its regulations between parent and child or the relations of humanity, and supersede those duties which may well be called Heaven-created in the human breast. But suffice it to say it is the right of self-preservation of a community to prevent the growth of vice, of pauperism, of ignorance; and, recognizing that, I am prepared to agree and to follow up by my vote and action, as I believe I always have as a private citizen and as a legislator, the duty of the State to see to it that the crime, the negligence, or the poverty, or the ignorance of the parent should not prevent children of a tender age incapable of self-protection from being guarded against ill-health of mind as against ill health and misery of body. But that is not the question here. The proposition is now under the powers of the United States Government to commence and continue for a period of ten years an outlay to carry on the common-school systems within the respective States, and for this purpose to lay taxes under the authority of the Constitution. It is not a fund already in hand that is to be appropriated, but it is to provide for the creation of a fund in the future, which can only be accomplished by the exercise of the taxing power of Congress.

Mr. President, it would be very superfluous for me to meet and answer the objection in regard to the power of Congress to make appropriations or donations of land for the purposes of education or for other purposes than those of education and the right of the same Congress to appropriate money for like purposes. A case was cited and has been the frequent subject of citation on this side of the Chamber by Mr. Justice Miller, of the Supreme Court, in which he not only strictly limited the exercise of the taxing power anywhere by Congress or its still more untrammeled exercise by the States to public objects within the jurisdiction of the taxing power, but his language was that to lay the hand of power upon the property of one citizen for the purpose of conveying its benefits to another was robbery under the forms of law.

That was the unanimous decision of the court of which he is a member; and yet not in one case but in a hundred cases, not in a single line of authority or the current of authority, but what Judge Black called the torrent of authority has admitted the power of the Government to deal with the public lands for the purposes of education, for the purpose of the remuneration of soldiers, for the purpose of inducing immigration, for encouraging the growth of timber, for the purpose of facilitating railroad construction. There may be found a hundred decisions by the same court which distinctly as words can permit have denied the authority to exercise the power of taxation for any but a public purpose committed to the jurisdiction of the Government that sought to exercise it.

Mr. President, the system of laying and collecting taxes adequate to the requirements of both the State and the Federal Government, by the action and power of the Federal Government alone will not and can not be restricted to a single subject; but it must soon logically, by the very nature and growth of its own powers, occupy the entire field of taxation within and without the United States. By the Constitution the entire field of exterior taxation is exclusively committed to Congress. No State can lay a duty upon imports, or if even by consent of Congress it lays any duties the net proceeds must be paid into the Federal Treasury under the Constitution. To-day under the exclusive power in Congress to lay duties upon imports, imposts, and excises, we have a system that has raised the rates of duty, not for the object of collecting revenue, but for the purpose of stimulating and assisting competition on American soil conducted behind the barrier of these external taxes. We have a result that persons who do not produce or manufacture the commodities upon which such duties are laid are incidentally taxed four times, five times the amount of revenue that is paid into the Treasury of the United States.

This system of occupying the entire field of taxation, and as a proclaimed right, has at last by the growth of time found its way into the public declarations of one of the great parties of the country. In the rich, populous, and powerful State of Pennsylvania the dominant party have by declaration to the public claimed the power as legal and advised its execution, that the present scale and rate of Federal taxation should be increased and expanded, more taxes laid, and more articles included and embraced in the schedule of taxation for the purpose of creating a surplus which may be in accordance with the line of this bill redistributed to the people from whom it was already drawn.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me a word at that point? I should be glad to be enlightened in regard to any such action by the Republican party of the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. BAYARD. I believe I can produce to the satisfaction of the Senator the resolution of a Republican State convention passed approving the scheme, which originated with Mr. Wharton Barker, of the city of Philadelphia. I had a pamphlet from that gentleman; I know that it was widely circulated, recommending the very scheme to which I have referred, and I believe that I have seen, and I think I can produce, the indorsement of that plan by the party of which Mr. Wharton Barker is an influential and honorable member.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not wish the Senator from Delaware to understand me as saying that the Republican party did not in its platform commit itself by resolution to that plan, but I do not understand that plan to go so far, or nearly so far, as the Senator states.

Mr. BAYARD. Well, if it be necessary I will hereafter produce that resolution, if it be worth while to criticise the precise words; but the Senator will not deny that the principle avowed was that which I have stated, and that it was intended and recommended to allow the General Government to lay greater taxes and collect more revenue than it needed for its own purposes, and take care of the expenses of the States by returning to them sufficient for the payment of certain of their local affairs, such as education, especially the common schools of the State.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator, but I think it may be proper that the subject should be properly understood, and I wish to say in this connection that that proposition has never so far received my assent, although the party to which I belong passed a resolution on the subject. I think, however, it does not go so far as to justify an increase of taxation for this purpose, but only relates to a distribution of the surplus which may be in the Treasury under existing laws. It does not propose to increase taxation in any way nor to interfere with existing legislation in relation to the subject of taxation, but to provide for a proper division of the surplus in the Treasury, as those who favor that plan understand it to be.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, my reference to the action of the Pennsylvania Republican State convention and to the pamphlet published by one of its most intelligent and distinguished leaders, was only intended as an illustration of the doctrine which I repeat lies imbedded within this measure we are now considering, and it becomes therefore not a question as to the principle, but simply as to the degree to which this doctrine shall be followed.

I do not know what the personal apprehensions of my friend on the other side may have been in regard to this question, nor do I know what his personal views may be about it, but I do know what the declaration of the party with which he acts has been on the subject in his own State, and I believe that I have referred to it in terms of sufficient accuracy.

There is to-day confessedly under our taxing system, external and internal, with all the extravagance and all the robbery that we know are going on, and which the administration confesses it has been unable to stop, a surplus of more than $100,000,000 annually, for which we must seek with some ingenuity a means of expenditure; and it is the doctrine of those of the school of the gentleman whose pamphlet I have referred to and of the party that adopted his declaration that it is right and proper and a due exercise of constitutional authority, for the General Government of the Union to lay taxes and collect revenue in excess of objects which were confided to its care, and to redistribute the surplus and excess to the people who had originally paid them.

Mr. President, my objection to this bill is that it is plainly in the line of such a policy, and when you embark on it it becomes a mere question of degree. If you have the right to collect money by the powers of the Federal Government not for the purposes of the Union, not for the uses of the General Government, not to carry out any power designed for the Federal Government, but to go beyond it, then you can logically and necessarily according to the will of any majority of Congress occupy the entire field of taxation, and American local self-government will die in atrophy, it will shrink to nothing from the disuse of its own faculties, and the spring of our liberties will be dried at its very source.

Mr. President, if a man be poor and if he need aid, I can see no better means of assisting him than not to take from him unnecessarily the little that he has. Whence comes the $15,000,000 the first year and the $14,000,000 the second and so on until you shall come down to half the sum at the end of ten years? Whence comes the $105,000,000 that ten years are to supply? Let it be understood I cavil not at the sum. If it were in my power to vote from myself many times over my individual share of that tax and bestow it for the purposes which have been so graphically presented, I should feel it a duty and a privilege so to do. I am not caviling at the amount, I do not say it is too large; if it can effect the cure it can scarcely be too large; but I am speaking of the principle which I think so all-important for the preservation of this Government, and I am speaking also of a measure which I think from its very nature would be unsuccessful.

To-day the condition of public education under State and local control is one of the most honest causes for American pride that American institutions can disclose.

Mr. MITCHELL. If it will not interrupt the Senator——

Mr. BAYARD. If the Senator means now to refer to the resolution of his State convention, I will ask him to bring it in a little later.

There have been few things in regard to which the American people have responded more liberally than they have in respect of providing for the education of the masses of their children, of those who by the accident of poverty, the restricted fortunes of their parents, were not able to secure that enlargement of the intellect, as Emerson calls it. There are few things more pleasant to consider than the munificence of private donations to the cause of education in this country; and be it noticed that it is not from the great scholars, it is not from the men of learning, it is not from the men who have been the professed educators of the country that the greatest aid has come, but it has been from the strong-minded men, who have fought their way through adversity and under circumstances of great trial, to whom the equitable institutions of this country have offered an easy road to fortune and advancement. It is those men who, touched by a sense of their own deficiencies and of their own early denials, have nobly determined that the poor and unfriended boys of their own land shall not suffer for want of opportunities that were denied to them. Therefore you see the college of Girard rise, and of Packer, and of Hopkins, and of Vanderbilt, and of Lennox, and of Rush, and of Peabody, and of McDonough, and of Astor, and of Pardee, and Corcoran; and this list, so pleasant to recite, so honorable to our people, could greatly be prolonged.

Sir, the other day I met a most intelligent man, a native of one of the New England States, now an honored member of the other House of Congress, who speaking to me of the manner in which the States had dealt with this question of public education, was most generous in his praise and appreciation of what he considered the superiority of the States of the western part of the country in their institutes of public education over that of New England itself. He told me that the great State of Texas had placed the public education of the people of that State upon a broader and a deeper basis than that of any State in the Union.

Sir, in such a rivalry let us all join and joyfully give the crown of excellence to the State that has best deserved it, not in reproach to any, but simply in commendation and thanks to those who have carried this public duty to the highest degree. This is the true progress of American self-government and the conduct by the State of those things intimate in its relations to the State, and which can not be comprehended by those who live beyond its borders and therefore are not cognizant of the demands of the locality for the exercise of the beneficence referred to.

Mr. President, it has been said that it is to the interest of this country and for the general welfare of this country that vice, ignorance, illiteracy should be lessened by all lawful means, and the power of Congress to assist in this in various localities has been alleged to be found in the words providing for the general welfare of the Government, accompanying the first grant of the power of taxation to the Congress of the United States. The words occur but twice in the Constitution. They are used in the preamble to describe the great ends for which the Constitution was ordained, in the same connection with the words to "establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." That is a recital. There is no doubt that the general welfare of the people of the United States was the object for which the National Government was formed by a union of the colonies which had become independent States by maintaining their declaration of independence from the Crown of Great Britain. "The pursuit of life, liberty, and happiness" had ended with the belief that these great objects of the human heart had been secured by the adoption of the Federal Constitution. The formation of the Union under the Constitution was the means whereby the general welfare, like liberty and happiness, had been secured to the American people, not otherwise.

How was the general welfare under that plan of government to be secured? How was it provided for? By leaving it to the Executive, or to the judiciary, or to the Legislature to "promote" as any or all of them combined should see fit? Certainly not. It was to be secured by the agency and under the form and under the conditions of a carefully worded charter to which the delegates of each State set their hands, George Washington at their head, and the ratification of the several States thereto. When it had been so ratified by nine States it should be their government. It was almost immediately ratified by eleven, and two years after unanimously by the whole thirteen. But the object of that government, among which was the general welfare, was to be secured by means of that Constitution itself by its ordination and according to its plan, and not in any other way. Other ways however seductive, other ways however desirable, were excluded by the ordination and adoption of the plan of government which we have all here assembled to support, and this is the Chamber and this is the body where of all others this distinction between the powers of the National Government and the governments of the States is to be recognized, defended, and strictly upheld. The other branch of Congress represents the national principle; this body represents the federal principle, and ours is a government in which those two were blended. It was not intended to impair or destroy either one or the other, but from the union of the two to promote a harmony that should secure to each the powers necessary to promote the general welfare of the people of the United States, and to secure the blessings of liberty to them and their posterity.

Hence it is that all essential powers of sovereignty are found in the Government of the United States, and the great powers of peace and war, the sole power to create armies and navies and control them, the power over every individual in the Union to call him into its service whenever needful, the power of unlimited taxation in order to sustain all those great powers of government and to perpetuate the existence of a National Government—all those were plainly confided to the Congress by the Constitution; and logically and necessarily all powers incidentally and impliedly necessary to make those powers enumerated fully effective were also to accompany them.

This Constitution enumerated these powers. It made them the supreme law of the land, paramount throughout the Union. It did not define them, for this is not a charter of definition; it is a charter of delegation and enumeration; and I know but a single definition in the Constitution, and that is of the crime of treason. The powers are enumerated, but definition of the powers is left to the legislative and judicial departments.

We find in the Constitution of the United States two governments plainly recognized, or what Chief-Justice Marshall calls a dual government, a Government of the United States and a government of each of the respective States. The tenth article of amendment expressly declares that the powers not delegated to the United States nor prohibited by it to the States were reserved to the States respectively, and every article of the Constitution could be appealed to to show that it contains just such clear recognition of this duality of powers. The powers necessary for each are here recognized. Those for the General Government are enumerated and delegated; those for the States are reserved. They did not need delegation or enumeration for that which they already possessed; all remained in them which had not been delegated to the General Government or which were not expressly inhibited to them.

Now, let us carry this in mind when we look at the grant of the taxing power to Congress. "Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises to pay the debts." Whose debts! The Government was the Government of the United States. It certainly was not to lay taxes to pay the debts of the respective States, nor could it possibly provide for the welfare of the respective States. To adopt any other construction would throw the whole plan of the Constitution into utter confusion and reduce local self-government to a ciphers; but the General Government would provide for every local expense by Federal taxation and cover the whole field according to the theory of a portion, if not the whole, of the Republican party in the State of Pennsylvania.

Now, Mr. President, as to the "general welfare," there is a construction which, it seems to me, this bill must be founded upon, and which has been accepted here in debate, that, in my judgment, would render the rest of the Constitution entirely superfluous if it were adopted, and that would be to grant an unlimited authority, and for any and every purpose whatever, of taxation by the Congress of the United States.

One moment as to this power of taxation. It is the most sovereign power conceived of by man. It extends to everything that he can create by his industry and which may be taken from him under the power of taxation. It is essentially unlimited in every republic as in the most unlimited of monarchies. It has no other limit than the discretion of the agency to whom it is confided, and this is the power that is claimed for the Government of the United States, and justly claimed where the objects of its exercise are such as have been confided to its care by the Constitution. But the moment that you shall say that not only is the power of taxation by the Congress unlimited, but that the application of the fund so raised is unlimited and the purposes of the taxation are unlimited, then you have a government that it is idle to speak of as having any limitation on its power except the will and pleasure of the dominant majority.

On this subject what has been said? Where is the writer, where is the commentator upon American constitutional law who has ever said anything like this? It seems idle at this time, but going back to the very foundation of the Government and coming down to the present day, take any one recognized as authority on constitutional law and discover if you can any such meaning. Alexander Hamilton has been cited as a centralist of power, as the antipodes to the theory of Thomas Jefferson. I have often had occasion to cite authority in the last fifteen years in the Senate for constitutional restraints upon executive and Congressional encroachments, and I mean here to say that no American living or dead has been more impressively cited to prevent the centralization of power than Alexander Hamilton. He says—I read from page 145 of the thirty-third number of the Federalist:

> If individuals enter into a state of society the laws of that society must be the supreme regulator of their conduct. If a number of political societies enter into a larger political society, the laws which the latter may enact, pursuant to the powers intrusted to it by its constitution, must necessarily be supreme over those societies and the individuals of whom they are composed. It would otherwise be a mere treaty, dependent on the good faith of the parties and not a government, which is only another word for political power and supremacy. But it will not follow from this doctrine that acts of the larger society, which are not pursuant to its constitutional powers, but which are invasions of the residuary authorities of the smaller societies, will become the supreme law of the land. These will be merely acts of usurpation, and will deserve to be treated as such.

After speaking of the necessity for a concurrent jurisdiction over the power of taxation, he says—I read from the preceding number of the Federalist by Hamilton:

> The necessity of a concurrent jurisdiction in certain cases results from the division of the sovereign power; and the rule that all authorities, of which the States are not explicitly divested in favor of the Union, remain with them in full vigor, is not only a theoretical consequence of that division, but is clearly admitted by the whole tenor of the instrument which contains the articles of the proposed Constitution. We there find that, notwithstanding the affirmative grants of general authorities, there has been the most pointed care in those cases where it was deemed improper that the like authorities should reside in the States to insert negative clauses prohibiting the exercise of them by the States. The tenth section of the first article consists altogether of such provisions. This circumstance is a clear indication of the sense of the convention, and furnishes a rule of interpretation out of the body of the act, which justifies the position I have advanced, and refutes every hypothesis to the contrary.

And be it remembered that that was written before the adoption of the tenth article of amendments, which recited in express language the doctrine here laid down by this commentator upon a government whose genius he is proved to have comprehended as time has gone on. It was not the question of what his original theory was of what this government ought to have been; it was not the question that he would have made a more centralized government had his plan been followed; but when the plan of others than his own, when the plan of Jefferson and Madison, that is to say a plan in accord with their judgment had been prepared, it found in Hamilton as able and as ardent an advocate as if it had been his own original proposition. Let me read a word on this subject from the thirty-second number of the Federalist:

> I am willing here to allow, in its full extent, the justness of the reasoning which requires that the individual States should possess an independent and uncontrollable authority to raise their own revenues for the supply of their own wants. And making this concession, I affirm that (with the sole exception of duties on imports and exports) they would, under the plan of the convention, retain that authority in the most absolute and unqualified sense; and that an attempt on the part of the National Government to abridge them in the exercise of it would be a violent assumption of power unwarranted by any article or clause of its constitution.

An entire consolidation of the States into one complete national sovereignty would imply an entire subordination of the parts, and whatever powers might remain in them would be altogether dependent on the general will. But as the plan of the convention aims only at a partial union or consolidation, the State governments would clearly retain all the rights of sovereignty which they before had, and which were not by that act exclusively delegated to the United States. This exclusive delegation, or rather this alienation of State sovereignty, would only exist in three cases: where the Constitution in express terms granted an exclusive authority to the Union; where it granted, in one instance, an authority to the Union, and in another prohibited the States from exercising the like authority; and where it granted an authority to the Union, to which a similar authority in the States would be absolutely and totally contradictory and repugnant. I use these terms to distinguish this last case from another, which might appear to resemble it.

Now let us turn for one moment to his great compeer, the man who stood with him in the Cabinet of Washington, and as Mr. Webster said, with the hand of Washington resting upon the shoulder of each—Mr. Jefferson spoke on this subject. I find in a letter to Albert Gallatin, one of the most distinguished leaders of the Jeffersonian party:

The act was founded avowedly on the principle that the phrase in the Constitution which authorizes Congress "to lay taxes, to pay the debts and provide for the general welfare," was an extension of the powers specifically enumerated to whatever would promote the general welfare; and this, you know, was the Federal doctrine. Whereas, our tenet even was, and, indeed, it is almost the only landmark which now divides the Federalists from the Republicans, that Congress had not unlimited powers to provide for the general welfare, but were restrained to those specifically enumerated; and that, as it was never meant they should provide for that welfare but by the exercise of the enumerated powers, so it could not have been meant they should raise money for purposes which the enumeration did not place under their action; consequently that the specification of powers is a limitation of the purposes for which they may raise money.

I wish to cite not Mr. Jefferson alone, not Alexander Hamilton alone, but shall I take Mr. Justice Story. He has been cited and recited. There is one word of his that I think I should like to read, because it may be called his parting salute to the question. He had gone over it, apparently changing his mind from time to time or rather making various expressions of his judgment in regard to this very indefinite power claimed, but at the end he says—I read from section 980 of Story on the Constitution:

An unqualified power to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare, as the second part of this clause would be if considered as a distinct and separate grant, would extend to every object in which the public could be interested. A power to provide for the common defense would give to Congress the command of the whole force and of all the resources of the Union; but a right to provide for the general welfare would go much further. It would, in effect, break down all the barriers between the States and the General Government, and consolidate the whole under the latter.

That is the effect of the construction which has been contended for here in debate; and do we stand here professing deliberately to consolidate all the powers of this Government, to destroy all local self-government, to annihilate all State power? In other words, do we stand here to vote to revolutionize the system under which the blessings of liberty were intended to be secured to ourselves and our posterity?

Sir, there is a writer of to-day, a man learned in the law and learned in more than the law, Dr. Francis Wharton, who I think now is filling the chair of international law in Harvard University, who has given in the present year his Commentaries on American Law to his countrymen, in which he has carefully and elaborately reviewed the historical field, and the progress of this evolution of our Government, this growth of institutions which we have heard referred to. But the question is whether evolution has resulted in revolution, for that it seems to me is in two words the result that would be reached by adopting the construction asked for by many who favor this bill. I read from page 404 of Wharton's Commentaries on American Law:

The first observation to be made on this clause is that the words "provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States" are a qualification of the taxing power. The taxation is "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense," &c. Congress, at least by this clause, has not power to "provide for the common defense and general welfare." How far it can do this is determined by subsequent clauses. Whatever it has power to do under such clauses, this clause authorizes it to impose taxes to pay for.

Mr. President, is the power of the education of the citizens of the various States committed by the Constitution to Congress? Certainly no one will contend that it is by any express grant. Is it by implication that is even arguable? Will not any implication of that kind, assented to, lead inexorably to the overthrow of the whole theory of our form of government, to the absorption of every power in one of these dual governments under which we live and which were intended jointly to secure all the needs of government? Sir, it is to me quite as fatal, quite as treasonable in the modern sense of the word, quite as unfaithful to stab this system of ours in one mortal part as in another; but so far as I am concerned the hand which inflicts the wound shall never be mine.

This power of the education of the children and the people of the community by its very nature—for that is the rule which Hamilton laid down for the construction of constitutional powers—belongs to the States in accord with the Constitution. In the nature of things to each community, who knows its needs, local self-government includes as its most important function the moral health and mental training of its citizens. Necessarily in the nature of things it must belong to the States. By all the canons of construction there being no delegation of this power to the General Government, there being no inhibition of it to the State governments, it lay with the government where it had always inherently reposed. Therefore it does lie among what Chief-Justice Marshall calls the "immense mass" of powers that lay reserved for the control and the exclusive control of the States.

That was his language when he clothed the skeleton of Federal power with the strongest muscles it possessed. The case of Gibbons vs. Ogden was the declaration of vitality to the powers of the nation. It decreed one commerce for the people of the United States and one power alone to govern it; and he, with all that serenity of wisdom that marked him in his high place, said, while clothing the National Government with essential powers for self-preservation and control, he must not forget the States out of which it was constructed and upon which it must rest for its strength and security. And so after prescribing the delegated powers and conceding them unlimitedly to the General Government, he referred to that "immense mass" of undelegated powers that remained in the States, and which include their powers of self-government and all that go to make men competent for self-government. Among these none is more intimate and essential than the education, care, and training of the children. Deprive a community of control over the public education of its children and it is idle to speak of it as possessing local self-government.

No State has ever divested itself of the power nor can it ever divest itself before God of the duty to look after the ignorant, the unfortunate, the degraded within its limits. Nature demands it; our scheme of government requires it; and when Congress invades and takes possession of that field, overstepping the bounds of its power, we are throwing into confusion this beautiful fabric designed by checks and balances to secure liberty and justice among countless millions of people whose right it is to be left to control themselves in all the duties that relate to a just exercise of American citizenship.

Sir, this question of education is one of the gravest that can be stated. There is a power of the parent that the State may not invade; there is a duty of the parent that the State may possibly be called upon to fulfill should the parent neglect it; but if you seek to cure a disease, moral or physical, must you not remove the cause? Is it not common sense to go below the surface and treat the cause of the disease?

Now, Senators, which is the parent and which is the child; pauperism or ignorance? Ignorance will beget pauperism; pauperism will beget ignorance. No man who has dealt—and I claim to have sought to understand the practical bearings of this question—no man who has dealt with the very poor, those who are borne down to the extremity of pauperism, but will know that the first step to relieve them is to create a healthy body as the tenement of the healthy mind. Reasonable and sufficient food, warmth, shelter, cleanliness, decency of apparel, and comforts in life—these are almost the prime necessities before you shall begin to raise the mental condition. Every one knows that when we see a poor boy in the streets neglected and abandoned by his parents, the first thing is to make his body comfortable, to clothe him and warm him, to nourish him, and then when his physical faculties are in a proper state, to approach the higher part of his creation and permit his mind to rise to a comprehension of social duty. Can Congress do this? The States can do it. A wisely governed State does do it and ever will do it. Can Congress do this? Can the poor of the States, the sick, the maimed, pass here under the eye of this central power? Is there anything in our knowledge that befits us to enter upon this field of local examination? Sir, the best-hearted man here can do little of that which is required for local purposes and charities in Delaware or California.

So, sir, I hold that the power of Congress to provide for the general welfare is in the way contemplated and authorized by the Constitution and no other. The money proposed by this bill is to be raised by taxation by the General Government for what? To accomplish only such things as Congress is commissioned to do, over which Congress has jurisdiction, which were committed to its care by the Constitution, but over matters not committed to its care Congress has no jurisdiction; it has no power to tax in order to sustain them.

Mr. President, the concession of this power to Congress must end in the withering of the States and in the destruction of their necessary and reserved powers. The power of taxation is the most far-reaching and comprehensive power confided to Government which can be exercised in such way and under such conditions and to such extent as Congress shall see fit in its discretion. From the necessities of the subject it rests solely, and is restrained only by the discretion of the department to which it is delegated. The measure of the tax burden Congress alone can control; the subjects of the burden are restricted by the Constitution expressly as in the case of export duties and impliedly as to the instrumentalities of the States; but if it be conceded that the power to lay taxes can include subjects not within the jurisdiction of Congress but expressly and admittedly and necessarily under State control, then I say you have embarked upon a principle never before heard of or claimed, and which is dangerous in the extreme. I know this bill will be held as a precedent, in my judgment a most dangerous one, which will go far to destroy all demarkation between the powers and the duties of the General Government and the powers and duties of the State governments. This to me is alarming, and because I can not pass it by in silence I have said thus much.

Aristotle gave as a definition of intellect "that by which we know terms or boundaries." "Teach the boy," says Emerson, "the difference between similar and the same." Mr. President, is not this accuracy of thought essential to fidelity as an American citizen to know the terms and boundaries of this dual and complex system of State and national power under which we live? It is the first duty of the American citizen; it is the main duty of the American Senator, and this is the council chamber where the terms and the boundaries between the power of the nation and the power of the pillars that support the nation should be carefully insisted upon and guarded. The safety and security of each are involved.

Confusion and distress must arise and will ensue from confounding the similar and the same in our lawmaking, and so I stand to-day to insist upon obedience to the letter and the spirit of the fundamental law. Reverence for law is a potent element in the mind of a self-governing people. As we sit here to-day the proofs of a spirit of lawlessness come to us from a great city filled with wealth and culture, and in letters of blood and by the light of her burning records we can read the dangers of departing from law; and here we stand sent by the States to represent them, and shall we not deliberate in the seclusion of our Chamber and set the example of absolute and strict adherence to the fundamental law which is the government of the American people?

Mr. President, the subject can not be surpassed in importance. It could be considered under so many phases, there are so many points of view, there could be so many illustrations, that the discussion would be as endless, as to a lover of the country it would be interesting; but the time of decision has come, and I have given at greater length than I had intended some reasons why, despite my sympathy, despite my feeling almost of despair in contemplating the difficulties and the dangers which confront my brethren in other States where this terrible race question exists, I can but feel that their States and their welfare and their liberty can be best preserved by me by adhering to my conscientious judgment of what is the true government of the American people.

All of the money now proposed to be appropriated came from the pockets of the people—and a reduction of excessive taxation will leave a much greater sum in the hands of the people, who can and will apply it more usefully to the great needs of public education.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, on yesterday when my friend the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] was delivering his able and lucid argument on the educational question he happened incidentally to allude to the tariff question, and during the able remarks which he made on that question the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] interrupted him, and with his consent read certain extracts from a newspaper, relating to a number of very worthy gentlemen, some of whom are my constituents, giving their opinions on the tariff question and the bearings of that question upon Southern manufactures. By the request of the Senator from Kentucky the Senator from South Carolina cut out from the newspaper the slip he read and gave it to the Senator from Kentucky to be incorporated in his remarks, and I find it in the RECORD of to-day. Those worthy and distinguished manufacturers take substantially the position that Southern manufacturers would be better off if the tariff were abolished entirely and we had absolute free trade. Of course they take this position in full view of the fact that we are obliged to raise over $300,000,000 a year by taxation to support this Government and meet all its obligations even when economically adminstered. The advocacy of free-trade is therefore the advocacy of direct taxes, to raise from the people by an internal-revenue system or by direct taxation this enormous amount of money, several times as large as the whole State tax now collected in each State. If the tariff is abolished the direct tax must necessarily follow, as they must all admit.

However, it is no part of my purpose to discuss the tariff question in this connection, and I do not intend to do so. I do not arraign the Senator from Kentucky for the remarks he made on it in his speech yesterday, because the bill before the Senate is one to appropriate money, and when we are making large appropriations it is very proper to inquire how we are to raise the money to meet the appropriations. It seems to me, therefore, that it is proper, if the Senator desires to do so, on every appropriation bill to discuss the tariff question. I make no sort of objection to it, but simply say that I do not desire to enter into that discussion now, and will not during the present discussion on the educational bill.

But as the newspaper slips referred to were read and spread upon the RECORD, and they reflect the opinions of a portion of my constituents, I think it just to another portion of the same constituency that their opinions on the other side of the question should be placed side by side with the opinions spread yesterday evening upon the RECORD.

It happened that on the very day those opinions were spread upon the RECORD here the Southern manufacturers were in convention in Augusta, Ga., examining this very question, the question of overproduction, hard times, difficulties in making the ends meet, and trying to arrive at some conclusion as to what is best to be done. They were interviewed last evening by a reporter of the Chronicle and Constitutionalist, and the result of the interviews is summed up in the Washington Post of this morning:

The Chronicle interviews with members of the convention show that the majority of manufacturers in attendance stand on the tariff plank in the Ohio Democratic platform.

As the convention was an important one and the article is short which describes it, I will send it to the desk and ask the Secretary to read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ALLISON in the chair). The Secretary will read the article.

The Secretary read as follows:

OVERPRODUCTION OF COTTON GOODS—SOUTHERN MANUFACTURERS TAKE STEPS TO REMEDY THE EVIL.

AUGUSTA, GA., April 3.

A meeting of the owners of cotton-mills throughout the South was held here to-day for the purpose of discussing the question of the supply of and demand for cotton goods. It was stated in a circular issued by the Augusta mill-men, who originated the call for the convention, that it was their belief that the purchasing power is not equal to the supply, and that for the benefit of all concerned it was of the greatest importance that some plan should be agreed upon to reduce the production of cotton goods. President Hickman, of the Graniteville Manufacturing Company, called the convention to order and welcomed the manufacturers of Augusta. J. F. Hanson, of Macon, was elected president and A. H. Twitchell, of Clifton, S. C., secretary. Mr. Hanson said the manufacturing interests just now were in anything but a satisfactory condition, and he hoped that united action would result in favor of the manufacturers of the South.

Representatives were present of mills which contain 265,000 spindles and 8,235 looms, with a capitalization of $8,560,000. President Young, of Eagle and Phœnix Mills, Columbus, Ga., sent a letter expressing regret that he could not attend. He thought the surplus complained of was more apparent than real, and that jobbers were now buying and trading from hand to mouth and compelling factories to carry goods formerly bought in bulk. He thought that limiting the production would hurt needy operatives and engender strikes. The committee on business reported in favor of the organization of an association to be known as the Southern and Western Manufacturers' Association, the object and purpose of said association to be of the same general character as those of the New England Manufacturers' Association.

In view of the short cotton crop of last year, the committee also recommend the adoption of a resolution "recommending that our spinners and manufacturers reduce their production in proportion to the reduced quantity of raw material now in the country."

The plan for the organization of a Southern manufacturers' association was unanimously adopted. The resolution looking to a reduction of the production was discussed at length, all the speakers agreeing as to the necessity for a curtailment of the production of yarns and cloth, the only difference being as to the manner of accomplishing the result. After several hours of discussion ex-Governor Bullock offered the following, which was unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That it is the unanimous sense of this meeting that the production of yarns and cloth be curtailed pending definite action by our committee."

The committee of fifteen to whom was referred the organization of a Southern manufacturers' association were instructed to formulate a plan for reducing the production of yarns and cloth. This was the largest and most influential meeting of cotton manufacturers ever held in the South. The result shows harmonious and determined action for a curtailment of the production.

The Chronicle interviews with members of the convention show that the majority of manufacturers in attendance stand on the tariff plank in the Ohio Democratic platform.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, as you will observe by hearing the document just read at the desk, Mr. J. F. Hanson, of Macon, Ga., was elected president of this large association of Southern manufacturers. It is stated there that a letter was read from President Young, of Columbus, giving the reasons why he could not attend. By reference to the record of yesterday's proceedings, and to the extracts read from the newspaper by the Senator from South Carolina, giving the opinions of prominent manufacturers that no tariff was necessary to enable them to prosper in their business, the opinion of President Young is referred to in very strong terms on that line. He is a very worthy gentleman and an able man; his opinions are entitled to great weight; but as other Southern manufacturers do not agree with President Young, and as Mr. Hanson, the president of the convention referred to, who is a prominent manufacturer in Macon, Ga., has replied, I think, with a great deal of force to the letter of President Young, written to Hon. HUGH BUCHANAN, of the House of Representatives, and as the opinions of President Young, though not his letter, are put upon the record by the Senators from South Carolina and Kentucky, it seems to me it would be but fair play that the reply of President Hanson should accompany those opinions upon the record. I therefore, without any intention whatever to discuss the merits or demerits of what has been said by anybody in this connection, will send the letter of President Hanson to the desk and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be read, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

COTTON MANUFACTURING IN THE SOUTHERN STATES AND IN NEW ENGLAND—THE ADVANTAGES AND DISADVANTAGES OF BOTH COMPARED—REPLY OF J. F. HANSON TO COL. W. H. YOUNG'S BUCHANAN LETTER.

The positions of Mr. Young, president of the Eagle and Phœnix Manufacturing Company, of Columbus, Ga., and myself in reference to the position of Southern cotton manufacturers as compared with those of New England and Great Britain have of late attracted some attention. They are embodied in a letter written to Hon. HUGH BUCHANAN, member of Congress from the Columbus district, by Mr. Young, which letter was read before the Ways and Means Committee, and my testimony before the same committee. A copy of Mr. Young's letter will be published with this reply. My testimony is in the hands of the committee. Of this I have no copy. I shall restate here the positions I maintained before that committee, with the facts and arguments brought forward in their support.

The question of cotton manufacture in the South is of vital importance to the people of this section. It is of interest to the country and the world. The opinions of both Mr. Young and myself will be tested by the facts in the case. When the sentiment engendered by the former shall have perished, the latter, strengthened by the logic of events, will constitute the basis upon which all permanent and profitable investments in cotton manufacturing in the South must rest. If I am in error, I am willing to be set right. To me this is a business question, like merchandising, banking, or planting. Neither can be profitably or permanently followed upon theories unsupported by experience. I will accord to Mr. Young the same position; then, stating the case as I apprehend it, submit it to the judgment of the public.

There are two theories in reference to the position of the South in cotton manufacture. One is that we have overwhelming advantages in raw material, climate, and labor, while in all other respects we are equally as well situated as the mill-owners of New England. This I understand to be the position of Mr. Young. It has always been maintained by the Eagle and Phœnix. (While Mr. Young has not been the president of that company from its organization, he has been regarded as its leading spirit.)

The other is that we have decided advantages in raw material, something possibly in climate, while it is doubtful if we have anything in labor, and that in other respects we are at great disadvantage, notably in distance from our base of supplies for machinery, repairs, and findings, and in deficient skill in construction and operation of mills, as these conditions affect cost of mills and quantity, quality, and diversity of production. To this latter opinion I am forced by experience and observation both to adhere.

So far as public opinion, in the South especially, is concerned, the former are greatly exaggerated and the latter unwisely underestimated. To this fact, for which Mr. Young is largely responsible, I attribute the wasteful and reckless investment of money in all sorts of cotton mills in the South, for several years past, and the grave situation of this interest here at present. I stated to the Ways and Means Committee that the Eagle and Phœnix had made the largest impression upon the country of any mill South, with reference to the advantages that existed here for cotton manufacture. For this reason, as well as for convenience and forcible illustration of the error of Mr. Young in many if not all of his statements, I propose to sustain my position by the reports of this company, and stand or fall by the same. I shall not go outside these reports and Mr. Young's Buchanan letter, except for a few facts and illustrations not covered by them.

Mr. Young, in his Buchanan letter, says that his consumption of cotton is fifty bales a day, and that a New England mill would have to pay for this cotton $350 more than it costs his company. This, it will be seen, is $7 per bale. Taking the weight of the bale at four hundred and seventy pounds, this would make a difference of 1.48 cents to the pound.

The market reports published in the daily papers of Columbus will show that the price of middling cotton in Boston will not average the year round more than 1 cent per pound above middling cotton in Columbus.

It must be true, then, that this is the difference, and all the difference, that Mr. Young has as an advantage in the cost of his cotton. This is so plain, and the proof so accessible, that I am surprised that Mr. Young should have overlooked it. He will find that every man engaged in the cotton trade will fully sustain this proposition.

If he has any such advantage, in the cost of his cotton, his report of last year fails to show it, as his mills did not earn $7 a bale on his consumption of cotton, as he only reports $93,800 earnings, while his consumption of cotton for the time the mills were in operation, according to his report (page 3), 298½ days, at $350 a day, would have amounted to $104,387.50.

There is no method of determining, accurately, climatic effects. In winter we require less fuel for heating the mills, and for the operatives less fuel and clothing than in New England. This is clear, and is an advantage. How far it is counterbalanced by the length of our summers, the malarious conditions, and lassitude to which we are subjected by reason of the same, is an open question. I have no data upon which to attempt a statement covering this point. So far as I am advised nothing definite is obtainable. Individual opinions, in the absence of well-authenticated results, settle nothing.

I am inclined to the belief that in labor we have no advantage. While it is cheaper here per capita, it is less efficient. Both these facts are well known and understood. The wage of an operative per day is not the question with manufacturers. They look to the cost per pound of product. This may be cheaper with efficient and higher-priced than with indifferent and lower-priced labor.

This fact may not have suggested itself to Mr. Young. If it had he must have overlooked it when he stated in his Buchanan letter that labor was higher in England than the South.

With all respect to Mr. Young's age and experience, I must be permitted to challenge this statement and demand the proof. His unsupported assertion will not settle this question. I might refute it now, but as no man, in law, is required to prove a negative, I will not consume time for this purpose. It is his statement, and is an important statement, but he must prove it by the relative cost per pound of given classes of cotton goods before it can be accepted as a basis of investment in Southern mills, or as a safe indication of Government policy in reference to the tariff question. I beg the reader to bear in mind the true basis of determining the cost of labor, skill, and efficiency, determined by quantity and quality of products, as I shall have occasion to allude to results that will fully sustain my position on this question.

Maintaining that the South has an advantage of 1 cent per pound on cotton over New England, and that this is all she has, let us take into the account the serious drawbacks against which she has to contend.

The distance from which our supplies of machinery repairs and findings of every description have been drawn is a serious tax upon the mills of the South. It involves on coarse mills from five to six car-loads of machinery for every thousand spindles put in operation before a mill starts, and is perpetual on all renewals and supplies that are necessary for its operation. It will amount to 10 per cent. on the cost of machinery at the shops.

The absence of proper skill in constructing mills has often resulted in both expensive and faulty construction. The latter is followed logically by expensive and imperfect production. These results arise also from want of skill in superintendents and heads of departments, and even the labor, when mills are properly constructed and arranged.

New England has better skill than we have. She has the accumulation of fifty years of active experience among her population. She knows the value of her best men, and keeps them. We are forced to take our supply from those who, as a general rule, can not sustain themselves upon her standard of efficiency; hence we are largely in the hands of men she would not employ in positions we are forced to place them in.

We have, as a first result, expensive mills, as I have before stated. Upon this vital point I propose to refer to the report of Mr. Young to the stockholders of his company made in February last. On page 4 of same I find that he puts down the entire value of the real estate and machinery of his company at $2,039,902.50. In the real estate charge, among other items, I notice "city and Alabama property." If this is not used or is not necessary for the successful prosecution of the business of the company it should come out. If, on the contrary, it is necessary, it properly belongs to the cost of plant. The number of spindles in the three mills, as I remember, is 44,000. Divide the cost of plant by the number of spindles, and we get $46.11 per spindle as cost. This will be further modified if the number of wool spindles in the mill is not included in the total number of spindles. I will take the number of spindles as stated, however, and the cost of the plant as including "city and Alabama property," and will venture to suggest that no better evidence of the evils of our situation could be produced than the cost of this property.

A mill, to duplicate the production of the Eagle and Phœnix, in kind, quality, and quantity, can be constructed in New England for less than $30 per spindle, including all the storehouses, dye-houses, &c., necessary for the successful handling of its business. It may be said that much of this work on Mr. Young's mills was done when the machinery and materials of all kinds were higher than at present. I know this is true, and so far as the Eagle and Phœnix is concerned, it is fearfully true. But how are we to account for the fact, or escape the results of such high cost? I attribute it largely to mistakes, bad management, and the inconveniences, not to say insurmountable difficulties, in our way, and from which every mill in the South has suffered. If the property cost $16.11 per spindle more than a new mill of same value would cost in New England now, it would seem to indicate that good policy on the part of Mr. Young would be to write off the excess of cost. This, however, would be fatal to his theories—the theories upon which so much money has been invested in Southern mills. To reduce the value of his property on his books to New England standard would place it in his assets at $1,320,000 instead of $2,039,000 as at present, and with one stroke of a pen sweep away his "reserve fund," and leave him with a deficit instead of a surplus. This reasoning is based upon information as to cost of machinery, real estate, building material, &c., in New England, on the one hand, and Mr. Young's official report to his stockholders on the other. He has not a square foot of floor space occupied by machinery, or a machine in his mills that are worth in earning capacity more than it will cost to replace them. If he purposes to run New England out of the market on coarse cotton goods, it must be admitted that this wide gap will have to be closed, or in lieu thereof much of whatever advantage he enjoys will be canceled by it.

Skill in the management of New England mills, as this relates either to the manipulation of the work in the mills or the product of the mills in the markets, is another point at which Southern mills are at serious disadvantage. Georgia 4-4 sheetings of three yards to the pound weight have for some time sold all over the country for 6 cents a yard, 18 cents per pound, freight paid by mill to point of sale. These goods are made of about number 13 yarns. They can not be marketed as fast as they are produced at that price. It costs 1 cent per pound to weave these thirteen yarns into cloth after the yarns are spun. Rhode Island yarns, number eights, made of one grade better cotton, are selling in Philadelphia and other Eastern markets for 19 cents. Now, putting the difference in spinning number eights and number thirteens at the difference in value of stock of which they are made respectively, and it will be seen that the yarns of Rhode Island, in cops as they are doffed from the mules, are selling at 1 cent per pound above Georgia sheetings. Add to this the cost of weaving the cloth, 1 cent per pound, and the 1-cent cotton advantage is lost, and another cent on top of it. The same rule will apply to Eastern-made brown sheetings, but with possibly only one-half the show of a loss to the South as between the yarn and cloth. In short, Eastern goods sell higher than Southern goods made on the same styles of machinery, of the same grade of stock, and sold in the same markets. This every dry-goods merchant in the country will corroborate. This establishes the proposition that the skill and management of New England are higher and abler than with us, and count for a great deal when stripped of all delusive shams. Our mill products are forced to find sale on their own merits in competition with the same classes of goods made in New England.

I know but little of the quality of Eagle and Phœnix products, as from some cause or causes, better understood by Mr. Young than myself, they have been largely, if not almost entirely, supplanted with our dry-goods trade by other brands of goods. I understand the same thing is true of most of the cities in Georgia, or at least with the wholesale trade of the State. It may be that Mr. Young can not compete with the manufacturers at other points, who are supplying our merchants with the same classes of goods that are made by the Eagle and Phœnix, and many of which, notably common cotton plaids, the largest item in his manufactures, come from Philadelphia.

Pursuing the question of relative cost of production in the South as against the East, in which, as it will be seen, quality is at last an important item, I beg to call attention to the fact that at Augusta, Ga., where there is located more cotton machinery than at any point in the South, and where manufacturing has paid as well or better than at any other point, and where I am bound to maintain the management of mills is as able as elsewhere, the presidents of the Augusta, Enterprise, Sibley, King, Graniteville, and Langley Companies, joined by Mr. Cawthon, of Wesson, Miss., having recently united in a call for a meeting of Southern and Western spinners in Augusta on the 3d of April, to consult together in reference to the production and consumption of Southern goods. They suggest an overproduction, and it is universally agreed that the only remedy for the situation is in stopping the machinery wholly for a time, or partially until stocks are absorbed. This action is wise. It is taken by men who have the wisdom to understand and the courage to acknowledge the gravity of the situation. If any such concerted action has been taken by their Eastern competitors it has escaped my attention. They are working close, and here and there a mill is stopped. The instances where this has occurred have been few, except in case of strikes, and these have been as infrequent as at many other times. The indications are that the New England mills are in better condition to pull through than the Southern mills. Will not Mr. Young admit that such results strengthen the positions I maintained before the Ways and Means Committee, and which I am, substantially, restating here?

In Mr. Young's letter to Mr. BUCHANAN he says:

"The South is now engaged in manufacturing standard or heavy-weight goods, and which are mainly consumed by the masses of our population South and North, and now the South sends her surplus production to the North, where they displace all (italics mine) such heavy-weight goods as were formerly made there and sent South."

This statement is not entirely clear. If Mr. Young intended to say that we are replacing the heavy goods consumed in the South which were formerly made North, I agree with him. If he intends to say the heavy goods at the South displace all the heavy goods made North, I beg to differ from him. I will not rest the case on an assertion of mine as against an assertion of his. Perhaps Mr. Young has never heard of the Appleton, Atlantic, Boot, Massachusetts, Tremont, and Suffolk Mills at Lowell and Lawrence, Mass., or of the Stark and Amoskeag, at Manchester, or other mills at Great Falls, N. H., Lewiston, Me., and various other points where standard heavy goods are made. Investigation will show, I think, that the South manufactures less heavy goods than New England.

I have not the data to settle this question. It must be settled, however, and Mr. Young must in this case, as in that of the dearer labor of England compared with this country, bring the proof to sustain his assertion. I will admit it on nothing short of the proof, in the absence of which I challenge the statement. I state as a fact within my knowledge that Philadelphia is selling cotton plaids to Georgia. This is the leading article of the Eagle and Phœnix's product. Mr. Young's report shows he has an enormous stock on hand, and also, as I shall show before I get through, that his profits are next to nothing. If he has the superior advantages he claims, and is so partial to the "home trade," why does he allow Philadelphia to supplant him with a trade only a hundred miles from his mills? Where are Mr. Young's boasted advantages, if he is powerless to compete with this Northern competition, and allows the weaver of Philadelphia to sell his cloth in Georgia, while Mr. Young puts his product in his warehouses? These are questions that must be answered. They must be met by recovering the trade that has been lost by the Eagle and Phœnix, and is now in the hands of men that Mr. Young tells Congressman BUCHANAN can not compete with the Eagle and Phœnix.

I beg now to call attention to the reported earnings of the Eagle and Phœnix for the past year. The capital employed in the plant of the company and put down in Mr. Young's report to his stockholders as "assets" amounts, as I have already stated, to $2,039,902.50. His earnings for 1883 are set down at $93,823.06. Nothing is said about depreciation on account of wear and tear of machinery, &c., for the year. I therefore take the amount set down as "profits" to be gross profits for the year, which are a fraction over 4½ per cent. Now, Mr. Young will not deny that at least 2½ per cent. on value of plant should be carried to "sinking fund" to cover depreciation from wear and tear for the year. This low estimate presumes that his plant will last, with ordinary repairs, forty years. If 2½ per cent. is thus disposed of, he will have but 2 per cent. profits, provided he realizes the prices for all stock on hand January 1, at which same was invoiced in taking stock, preparatory to making up his accounts.

I notice that deposits in savings-bank department of the company amounted to $1,100,000. On this interest is paid, as I understand, at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum. The stock of material of all kinds, in the mills and warehouses, manufactured and in process of manufacture, exclusive of raw materials not in process, such as "supplies," "dyestuffs," "cotton," and "wool," foots up $968,000. Now it will strike any man who knows anything of the conditions upon which profitable manufacturing depends, that the business of a cotton-mill is in anything but a prosperous condition when it has to be done at figures so close that it will not permit the carrying of 2½ per cent. per annum to a special fund to cover depreciation and pay the people owning its stock, and who put up the money to build it, over 2 per cent. per annum. This suggestion is the more pertinent and forcible when goods made on such close profits have to be carried to the amount of over half a million of dollars on money from the savings department of the same company, and on which depositors get 6 per cent. interest. This is not a high rate of interest, however, but on the contrary is cheaper no doubt than could be obtained for such a business in any other way.

In this connection I desire to quote again from Mr. Young's Buchanan letter. He says: "I have visited England three times, and have investigated the cost of labor compared with the South and found it more, or higher than here." And again: "I also investigated the cost and selling price of heavy cotton goods, and concluded (italics mine) I could sell in England at a profit, but to do so I must adopt their peculiarities of style, and I prefer a home market."

Mr. Young's large accumulation of goods did not commence with last year, according to his report (page 3). Speaking of the operations of 1883, he says: "Our sales have exceeded the products." How? Why? Because, I suppose, he had fewer goods on hand at the close of 1883 than at the same time the year preceding, and during 1883 he had pushed goods to sale that he had stored the year before. Trade was not better in 1883 than 1882. Not so good. At the close of the former year accumulations of stock were not so large with Southern mills generally as in 1883. It must have been that Mr. Young could not meet the prices of 1882, when other Southern mills met the market and closed out their stocks. He did sell his product in 1883, and also reduced his accumulations from the preceding year, and, as every man knows who has been familiar with the course of prices, sold on a worse market than he stored on. I wish to make it plain that Mr. Young had ample time between his determination to hold goods in 1882 and his conclusion to sell in 1883 to have tested his ability to sell goods at a profit in England. If he was able to do this he owed it to his stockholders, whose interests were in his hands, to have done so, and I am persuaded he would have "changed his styles," and even waived his preference for "a home market," and sent his product to England at once if he had known he could dispose of same there at a profit. It will strike every one as a bad policy to have paid 6 per cent. interest to carry the product of a mill paying only 2 per cent. per annum on its cost with savings-bank deposits, on which he was paying three times this amount in interest, and when, as he "concluded," he had a ready demand for his product in England. To have utilized the latter market he had only to "change styles" and lay aside his preference for a "home market."

Mr. Young's conclusions and actions were not consistent, and I will venture to suggest that we shall never be able to dispose of competition from New England until we show greater capacity to adapt our styles to profitable demand for our products, and learn to sell the same upon the business principle of selling in the best market, as against any sentimental preference for other and unprofitable markets.

For the reasons I have stated I am convinced that as yet the South has no overwhelming advantages over New England in cotton manufacture even on standard heavy goods. This was substantially the line of my argument before the Ways and Means Committee. The testimony here presented, taken from the reports of Mr. Young's company, sustains the argument. If this is true, and if protection as at present secured to the cotton-mill interest of New England is necessary to sustain that interest, then the same necessity exists for protection to Southern mills. That this protection is necessary to existing cotton manufactures East is shown in the fact that the present rates of duties on cotton yarns and cotton fabrics of the fine grades has not been sufficient to develop their production in this country. Hence they are imported largely to supply a demand our own mills are not prepared to meet. The same difficulties I have pointed out as existing in the South to our disadvantage when compared to New England exist in New England when Great Britain is compared with her.

There is no mystery in such a situation. It is the result of agencies and forces that are perfectly apparent. England has the better skill, greater ability, and larger experience necessary to compete for this trade than New England has, just as New England has the advantage of the South in these particulars on the goods for the production of which they are now competing. These facts may not be admitted now, but the time is coming when they will be seen and acknowledged of all men as conditional in any great manufacturing supremacy the South is ever to obtain. Neither Mr. Young nor myself are responsible for the facts in the premises. I am endeavoring to deal with them in theory just as I find them developing in the practical handling of the cotton-mills under my charge, and in which all I have and more is invested. I can not retire from the field, if I would, without ruinous sacrifice. I think, however, that I am no worse off for acknowledging the situation as I find it than I would be were I blindly to ignore its difficulties and dangers.

Mr. Young's position in favor of free trade, whether he realizes it or not, is in direct conflict with the interests of his stockholders. He would get "free machinery" as a result of this policy, cheaper dyestuffs, and lower-priced wool. On the other hand, the enormous cost of his present property would preclude the possibility of operating it successfully in competition with new mills which would be built and supplied with lower-priced machinery and on a lower basis of cost. He would find that, as in his case, compared with New England on cost, he would be at the same disadvantage with his new competitors in the South. Free trade to the Eagle and Phœnix means a large reduction in value of its property, even on present basis of New England cost. The latter puts him at disadvantage of $16 on every spindle he operates, and free trade would still further scale that value. To put the case mildly, both combined would shrink his assets fully $1,000,000, or four-fifths of the par value of his capital stock. If Congress will support Mr. Young and shape the policy of the Government to correspond with his theories he will surely "hoist himself with his own petard."

J. F. HANSON.

MACON, GA., 1884.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Hanson, the author of the letter just read, the president of the manufacturing association of the Southern States, is a citizen of my State. He is a gentleman of the highest order of integrity, of fine ability, of great energy, and of great usefulness; and as he has gone extensively into this question in his reply to Mr. Young, and as the opinions of Mr. Young were quoted on the floor yesterday, it occurred to me it was only an act of justice to have spread upon the RECORD the opinions on the other side of the question so that both may go to the country together. That is the only purpose I have in view at present. I may at a future time when the tariff question is before the Senate have some further remarks to make in connection with it. I do not desire to do so at present.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, I would not solicit the courtesy of the Senate to make any remarks upon the bill to aid education in the States if I did not feel, after so many Senators have spoken, that by my silence I should fall short of my duty to make known the zeal and the efforts of the people of Louisiana in the cause of popular education and the inadequacy of their resources to meet the public needs in respect of it.

In my opinion, reflecting men in all parts of the country who have considered the relations that exist between the present political conditions of society and these institutions of self-government have formed the deliberate judgment that the education of the people, the enlightenment of the suffrage, the elevation of the popular character and the popular conscience, the awakening of a loftier and healthier sentiment of national patriotism, is absolutely indispensable to the preservation of constitutional liberty.

In the beginning there were no impediments to the establishment of free government in America. Our forefathers brought with them all the guarantees—Magna Charta, the Petition of Right—the Bill of Rights, the Bible of English liberty; for these were their entailed inheritances, their birthright.

After the war of independence wealth was evenly distributed, and the country was sparsely inhabited. Every man felt that by the practice of frugality and industry he could achieve an independence in fortune. Every family possessed its own home. The manners and habits of the people were simple, their morals sound, and an ardent and heroic sentiment of unselfish devotion to country, excited by common trials and sacrifices, pervaded the entire community.

> Then none was for a party,
> Then all were for the state;
> Then the great man helped the poor,
> And the poor man loved the great;
> Then lands were fairly portioned,
> Then spoils were fairly sold;
> The Romans were like brothers,
> In the brave days of old.

But, sir, a transformation has taken place in the moral and political conditions of American society, in the habits, thoughts, and occupations of the people, as striking as that which is exhibited in the material appliances and agencies of life. The aspect of affairs has completely changed. A revolution has been wrought in the constituent elements and springs of action and power; wealth is no longer evenly distributed but concentrates more and more in the hands of a few, and vast numbers of our people live from hand to mouth upon their daily wages, dependent for employment upon those who control organized capital. Taking on the corporate form, the aggregations of accumulated wealth have reached such enormous proportions and are endowed with so many and such powerful rights, privileges, and franchises by the laws that their agents and directors are enabled, whenever they come in conflict, to override the safeguards of local self-government in the municipalities and in the States and to confront and challenge the supremacy of the Federal Government itself. Appeals come up from many quarters of the Union invoking the interposition of the national authority to defend the people by legislative enactments against the unjust discriminations, the heavy burdens and exactions that organized wealth imposes upon their occupations, their earnings, and their resources.

It is proposed that the Federal Government shall purchase or control the railroads of the country, the telegraph lines, and adopt measures to prevent such discriminations as may destroy the value of property in one locality and greatly enhance it in others by artificial means, or that enable these overshadowing corporations and commercial combinations for speculation to fix a price upon the food and necessaries of life and to determine the value of labor.

There can be no doubt about the fact that the rapid accumulation of wealth in the hands of a comparatively few persons has caused a deep-seated discontent throughout the most densely settled parts of this country, and that we are on the eve of an epoch in which it will require all the conservative intelligence and influences of the people and all the resources of a wise statesmanship to solve the problem which is presented by this disproportionate distribution of property—how to reconcile the concentration of wealth in the hands of a few with the diffusion of political rights among the many, a problem as old as the science of government, and which in every age and in every stage of civilization has taxed the wisdom of men. For history teaches that wealth and authority are closely connected, the latter the inseparable prerogative of the former, and that upon the laws controlling its distribution depend generally the form of government: when in the hands of one man, a despotism; when in the hands of a few, an oligarchy; and when divided among the many, a republic. Can it be possible to preserve the liberty of the many, these institutions of self-government, after a wide chasm shall have been created separating the wealthy classes from the vast majority of the people constituting the poor, dependent for their daily livelihood upon associated wealth, in its various forms exercising a dominion far greater than the Government itself? How far do such conditions of society lead to a despotic government on the one hand or to socialism on the other? How long will it be before we hear that the popular discontent can only be removed by the application of force, or that the popular wants and grievances can only be supplied by the spoliation of property or by the exertion of paternal power by the Federal Government under the plea that society must be saved from the disorders or anarchy that threaten it.

The distinguished Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] alluded a moment ago to the recent occurrences in the city of Cincinnati as teaching a lesson to Senators in this Chamber and warning them to be more faithful in their observances of the limitations upon power and in their fidelity to the guarantees of the Constitution. I read in the light of these disorders and conflagrations a different lesson. I see in them the importance, nay, the necessity, of educating the people in order that they may understand better than they do how to govern themselves; that they may comprehend not only their rights, but the duties and responsibilities of self-government. The cause of these disorders, causa causans, is not to be found in any imperfections of the machinery of government nor in a want of observance of the limitations of constitutional provisions, but, as I understand it, they arise out of the incompetency, the immorality, the want of self-respect and of intelligence among the people and in the officers they had elected to administer their laws.

The remedy is not to be found, therefore, in any readjustment of the framework of government or in interpretations of the Constitution, but in the forces that make up the daily life of the people, the cultivation of a more enlightened and humane spirit, of a higher sense of justice in their relations with one another. In other words, there must be self-discipline, and self-discipline can alone come from education.

While this is the development of society in one part of the country, what are the conditions in the other? Vast numbers of negro slaves were suddenly emancipated and made citizens of the Republic, and under the force of the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution they have been enfranchised. Upon a race suddenly emerging from the long night of barbarism and slavery into the sunlight of freedom have been imposed all the responsibilities of participating in the Government of the communities in which they live! Is it to be wondered at that they should be unable to meet these responsibilities with an intelligent judgment and in that spirit of self-restraint and a comprehension of public affairs which can only come from long training? Is it to be wondered at that there should be in such communities, especially in those where they equal in numbers the white race, their former masters, that there should be difficulties almost insurmountable in the preservation and efficient working of these complex institutions; of self-government that are wholly dependent upon the virtue and intelligence of the people who are to conduct them? What is the result of this state of affairs?

You find that the white people in the South have been forced in order to preserve their inheritance of constitutional liberty and the remnant of their property—I may say their civilization—by the very nature of things to act together in a solid body in one political party, while the emancipated slaves have from apprehensions that their liberties might be put in jeopardy joined in a solid mass almost the opposite political party. It was feared by the white people who had been the controlling class that if their State governments should be turned over to their recently emancipated negro slaves that, in the exercise of the power of taxation without a limit, their property would be confiscated and that internal convulsions and disorders would result similar to those that followed the emancipation and mastery of the negro race in San Domingo. I am glad to say that the relations between the two races have been gradually growing better, but it can not be hoped that there should be a readjustment of the political forces in society so long as the percentage of illiteracy and ignorance remains to such a fearful and pernicious extent. And until this illiteracy is removed there can be no division of parties in the South. The perils are too great. All questions of reform in the Government, all measures, all policies, all politics in fact, are merged in this one single issue of intelligence and property on one side insisting on supremacy with ignorance on the other, distrustful and incompetent.

Considerations of public policy induced Congress, in order to prevent the aggravation of the conditions unfavorable to constitutional liberty, to prohibit the immigration of the Mongolian race, the Chinese, into this country, and to deny to them any participation in the rights and privileges of American citizenship. And yet some of the earliest discoveries in science, and expressions of the highest morality, owe their origin to this race which in their own land have achieved the highest civilization to be found outside the limits of Christianity.

I must confess that my experience has led me to look more and more to practical measures for the improvement and elevation of the people, the source of power, rather than to statutes and constitutions that become lifeless forms unless constantly invigorated by the virtues and intelligence of those upon whom they are intended to operate.

These institutions of self-government do not grow and flourish in every soil, nor can they be maintained without the exercise of constant vigilance and the most strenuous exertions on the part of the governing and governed. They find their root, their nourishment, their support, not in numbers merely, nor in property diffused or concentrated, but in virtue and intelligence and the capacity of the people to govern themselves. The very qualities that enable a man to govern himself, to restrain his own passions, to help the weak, to injure no one, but to be just and kindly in all his relations and firm in the defense of his own rights, are the very qualities which must prevail among a people who wish to enjoy the blessings of free institutions.

I submit to the candid consideration of Senators if the conditions which I have endeavored to fairly state do not exist in both sections of the Union to an extent that excite in their minds the deepest solicitude and anxiety for the welfare of both the Federal Government which we are called upon to administer and the State governments which we represent in this august body. Are there not forces at work which if not adjusted and reconciled with these forms of government may destroy them? What is the remedy? We know what the remedy is among every other civilized people in the world but this. We know that among the most powerful and civilized nations of Europe great standing armies are held in readiness to enforce the law, to suppress discontent, to hold in check every exhibition of violence, and that the people are held down and oppressed and robbed of their earnings upon the plea that civilized governments may not be upheld and order and life and property preserved without the bayonet. We are trying the experiment of an intelligent ballot, and it does seem to me therefore that every resource of statesmanship should be brought to bear to enable the people of this country to prepare themselves by education to form a sound political judgment upon the measures and men who are to conduct their public affairs, and that they should be enabled to read the ballot which has been placed in their hands for good or for evil. Otherwise I can see in the ignorance and vice in my own country the sure source from which will spring those forces that will destroy ultimately these institutions of self-government and establish upon their ruins a chilling and blighting despotism.

The Senators who oppose this particular bill have expressed their sympathy for the cause of education and their conviction of the absolute necessity of affording the people of this country the opportunity to qualify themselves to discharge the duties that they owe their institutions of government. But it was said by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], and repeated by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] to-day, that this is a measure to override the jurisdiction of the States, to supplant the family, to take the child from its mother and father, and to subvert all the existing relations of society in the States where the fund is to be applied. This opinion rests upon a misapprehension of the bill itself. If such a purpose existed and was either concealed or expressed on its face, I for one would oppose it, for no one can appreciate more than I do the supreme importance of the family organization as the indispensable unit not only of a free State but of Christian civilization.

I can not see how a grant of a few hundred thousand dollars or even of a million dollars to the States in this Union to aid education therein out of the surplus fund in the Treasury, or from the sales of the public lands or the lands themselves, could have the effect to paralyze the efforts, to weaken the energies, to destroy the self-reliance of the people, or to overturn the family organization or their local schools or their colleges and universities. It must be remembered that the grant made by this bill to the States is intended to help the States in proportion as the States help themselves to educate not only the citizens of the State but the citizens of the United States who live in the several States of the Union. And the means which enable us to make this grant, and the grant itself, are not possessed by the Government as an independent and separate entity, but belong in fact to the very people for whose benefit we are about to apply them.

I recognize our form of dual governments and the necessity of observing carefully the boundaries of power and of duties separating one from the other. This is the Government of the people of the States. This is not an alien government, but within its sphere the Federal Government is as much the government of the people of a State as the State government itself, and the resources which we are about to apply to remedy this great evil come from the earnings of the people.

The argument against this bill, then, is not that the grant is not needed by the people, it is not that the evil to be remedied does not exist, it is not that education is already too widely diffused or that the needs in this respect have already been supplied, but the entire objection expressed by the opponents of this measure has been exclusively to the source whence the grant has been derived. They confess that if a million dollars were voted by the State government to education in the State it would be a great blessing and benefit to the people thereof, but that a million dollars voted by the National Government, deriving its resources from precisely the same source as the State government, namely, the people, instead of being a blessing to the people of the State will in fact bring unnumbered woes upon them.

It is said by our opponents that such a grant by a State government to education would be beneficent because a warrant for it could be found in the Constitution of the States, but that a similar grant to aid the State in the accomplishment of the same high purpose on account of the inadequacy of the resources of the State would be injurious when made by the Federal Government because it would be done in violation of the Federal Constitution. And if the grant be injurious when made by the Federal Government of money raised by taxation, I can not see why it should not be equally injurious if it consists of money taken from the surplus revenues of the Government or from the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, or if it be made by a donation of the lands themselves, for in every case before the benefits or the evils that are likely to be produced by the grant can occur the donation must be converted into money. In other words, no matter what may be the character of the grant or the kind of property, it must be finally resolved into money before it can be enjoyed or applied. Hence the practical results must be the same upon the communities in whose behalf these grants are made, whether they consist of one kind of property or another.

If it be true there be no authority in the Constitution of the United States for this legislation, then for one I can not favor it, for it will not do to put a strain upon the Constitution or to override that great charter which is the safeguard of all the rights and all the liberties that we possess.

Where, then, I ask is to be found the constitutional authority to make a grant of any kind to aid the States in the education of the citizens of the United States and of the States therein? It can not be found in the proposition suggested by the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN], who observed that inasmuch as the emancipation of the negro was a necessity of the Union in war, it had become a necessity for the preservation of the institutions of the Union in peace that he should be enfranchised and educated. While I might admit the urgency of this suggestion and the equitable grounds upon which it rests, I can not regard any consideration whatever of public exigency to the extent of what in my opinion or in the opinion of others might be an absolute necessity as a justification for the exertion of any power by this Government. All laws of the Government that do not rest upon constitutional authority are null and void, and must be so pronounced by the Supreme Court, and contain in themselves all the elements of usurpation. The exercise of unwarranted power is not merely unconstitutional, but deals a deadly blow both to the Constitution and to the liberty which it ordained and established and in which it is incased. The tyrant's plea has always been that of necessity, and under constitutional forms of government every measure that was despotic has sought to find its vindication in the notion that it was a necessity for the preservation of the life of the nation. I can find in it, therefore, no firm ground upon which may repose the legislation which we are attempting to conduct. It points the way rather to—

> That Serbonian bog
> Betwixt Damiata and Mount Casius old,
> Where armies whole have sunk.

Nor can I find in the war amendments of the Constitution any authority for this legislation, as was indicated the other day by the accomplished Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES]. As I understand them, these amendments gather up only and embody in the organic law the fruits of the civil war with respect to two questions that were more or less involved. Of course I need not explain that the chief purpose of the amendments was to establish a direct relation between the citizens of the United States and the Federal Government under which an allegiance superior to any to the States would be due to the Federal Government, and thus the principle of secession was eliminated from the Constitution. It will be observed that to accomplish this great purpose as well as the emancipation of negro slavery it was necessary to change by amendment the framework of the Government. It could not be permitted to remain as it had been.

The Supreme Court in 1856 held in the Dred Scott decision the following language:

> But there are two clauses in the Constitution which point directly and specifically to the negro race as a separate class of persons, and show clearly that they are not regarded as a portion of the people or citizens of the Government then formed. One of these clauses reserves to each of the thirteen States the right to import slaves until the year 1808 if it thinks proper, and the importation which it thus sanctions was unquestionably of persons of the race of which we are speaking, as the traffic in slaves in the United States had always been confined to them, and by the other provision the States pledged themselves to each other to maintain the rights of the master by delivering up to him any slave who may have escaped from service and be found within their respective territories.

Now, the thirteenth amendment of the Constitution declares that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall exist within the United States; and the fourteenth amendment, that all persons born or naturalized in the United States, or subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside; and the fifteenth amendment goes a step further by providing that the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

It will be perceived that the purpose and effect of these amendments were, first, to extirpate negro slavery as it had existed more or less in all these States from their first settlement, and to declare that persons of the negro race should become citizens both of the United States and of the States, and finally, that they should not by reason of their race be denied the right to vote either by the United States or by the States. But the fifteenth amendment of the Constitution was only a limitation or modification of the second section of the first article of the Constitution, which declares that "the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature." It is competent, then, for a State to determine the qualifications for the voters therein, but there is one qualification that they may not any longer impose and that is the one based on race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

The right to vote in the States comes from the States, but the right of exemption from prohibited discrimination comes from the United States. The first has not been granted or secured by the Constitution of the United States, but the last has. It was declared in the case of Minor vs. ———, (21 Wallace, page 178,) by the Supreme Court that the Constitution had not conferred the right of suffrage upon any one, and that the United States have no voters of their own creation in the States. The fifteenth amendment has invested the citizens of the United States with a new constitutional right, which is exemption from discrimination in the exercise of the elective franchise on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. While, therefore, the effect of this amendment by the prohibition which it contains is to allow negroes to vote, it can not be held that it directly confers the suffrage upon them. Nor do I believe that it affords any constitutional jurisdiction to Congress over the qualifications of voters in the States or over the elections held therein further than to see that the States themselves have observed the prohibitive mandate contained in this amendment to the Constitution.

There is no analogy between this provision, which is purely a prohibition on the States, and those positive grants of power upon the Government of the United States itself. Prohibitions are to be found in many of the provisions of the Constitution—I was going to say perhaps in a majority of the clauses of that instrument—prohibitions on the States as well as on the United States. The whole of sections 9 and 10 consist of prohibitions, prohibitions with respect to the emigration and importation of certain persons, with respect to habeas corpus, bills of attainder, ex post facto laws, capitations and other direct taxes, regulations of commerce, appropriation of money, titles of nobility, &c. And every one of the ten amendments first made to the Constitution is a prohibition upon the Government of the United States and limitation upon its powers. Nor can I find in the history of the Government any legislation with respect to these prohibitions which have carried the jurisdiction of the United States further than the limits I have described.

The three last amendments or war amendments are limitations and restraints upon the power of the States. But such prohibitions do not afford a basis for affirmative legislation or for an extension of the jurisdiction of the Federal Government further than to require that the prohibitions merely shall be observed. And any legislation of the Government which may attempt to exert a power beyond these limits I believe to be unconstitutional and void.

Nor can I see any warrant or justification for the pending bill or for any grant whatever in the second clause of section 3 of the fourth article of the Constitution, which reads as follows:

> The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State.

I have felt the force of the observations of the able and eloquent Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] upon this clause of the Constitution, but I am unable to concur with him in his conviction, as I understood him, that this clause confers on Congress any absolute power over either the territory or other property belonging to the United States. I can not find in it any justification whatever for the exercise of the power to make a grant either of the territory or of lands, or of any kind of property belonging to the United States. In my opinion, the power to dispose of and to make all needful rules and regulations means simply in the one case to sell or control the property, and in the other to erect temporary governments in the Territories of the United States until in the judgment of Congress they may be admitted as new States into the Union.

It is true, sir, that under the Articles of Confederation a grant was made by the State of Virginia of her northwestern domain to the States then leagued together, but it has always been held that the donation was accepted by the States in their individual capacity, and that the conditions that were imposed upon it in the first place by Virginia and by the confederation of States were afterward submitted to the State of Virginia for confirmation and approval. The disposition, therefore, of that vast territory was provided for before the adoption of the Constitution of the United States under a compact made between the States as independent and sovereign communities, and this provision of the Constitution which I have read was placed here for the purpose of carrying out in good faith a solemn agreement which was binding upon the States at the time that the Federal Government was established. But the public lands which have been acquired since from Georgia, from Spain, from France, from Mexico, have been paid for out of the revenues derived by the taxes imposed under the first clause of section 8, article 1, of the Constitution upon the people of the United States, or by their common blood and sacrifices in war.

Now, this territory and property of every kind and description is held by the Government in trust for the people of the United States under the enumerated powers of the Constitution for use or for settlement by the citizens of the United States, upon fair and equitable terms, or for sale. It is clearly not held by any compact between the States as was the northwestern territory, as I have explained, for, if it were so held, then the Government of the United States could exercise no proper jurisdiction over it without the direct consent of the States. The States have governments themselves to take charge of and control and to hold for their own exclusive benefit all lands and property that may belong to them as separate and distinct communities. Any exercise of power by Congress with respect to such land or property would be an absolute and unqualified usurpation. It follows then that the territory and property acquired by the United States in the manner that I have described is properly within its jurisdiction and as far removed from the powers of the State as any other matter exclusively within the circle of authority conferred by the Constitution upon the Federal Government.

It is held by the opponents of the pending bill that the land thus acquired may constitute a legitimate grant of the Federal Government, not merely to aid education in the State, but to aid any purpose or to accomplish any object approved by the discretion of Congress. I can not understand how such property or land referred to in this provision of the Constitution may be so disposed of when it is held that the very money for which it may now be sold can not be made a grant of by the Federal Government for the same purpose. You may take money out of the Federal Treasury to buy lands with, and then donate the lands to the States; but you may not donate the money itself. You may sell the lands and take the proceeds arising from the proceeds thereof and donate them. In other words, you may make a grant of the lands which you buy out of the Federal exchequer, or of the proceeds of the sales of those lands, but you can not appropriate one dollar of the money with which the lands were purchased. Here is a distinction that I can not comprehend and that I do not believe can lawfully exist. If you make a grant of lands, or the proceeds that arise from the sales of the lands, it is to all purposes equivalent to granting the very money which was used in the purchase of the lands. But I undertake to say that under this provision which I am now considering there is no authority whatever of appropriation or to make a grant either of territory or of the lands which may be embraced in it or of any property whatever.

If the Government may surrender by virtue of this clause of the Constitution any of its jurisdiction or rights or powers over the territory, the lands, or other property of the United States to any State or corporation or to anybody except in some manner pointed out by the Constitution, it might also surrender all the other grants of power delegated to it by the same instrument—the power of declaring war, of laying duties, or of coining money, which is an assumption of a right on the part of the Government to destroy the instrument of its existence and to dissolve the Union which it was established to maintain. I can see no difference between a grant of the public lands or a grant of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands and a grant of the surplus revenues of the Government or a grant raised from the customs in principle or in effect. They constitute the sources of revenue to supply the wants of the Government and to enable it to carry into execution the powers conferred upon it and the duties imposed upon it by the Constitution.

For every acre of land donated for any purpose or for every dollar taken from the proceeds of the public lands for any purpose, and for every dollar taken from the surplus revenues of the United States for any purpose, sooner or later another dollar must be raised by taxation to supply its place. No matter in what way the contributions for grants or donations are made, whether from the lands or the proceeds arising from the sales of the lands or from taxes, they are taken in point of fact from the available resources of the people, which can be used only for the support and maintenance of the Government according to the powers delegated to it by their Constitution, and it will not do to say that the burdens will fall more lightly upon them if their lands are taken, which were purchased by their money or the proceeds of the public lands, than if they were made from taxes. It all amounts to the same in the end. It is a contribution by the people, equally burdensome whatever form it may take, and a contribution drawn, whatever may be its guise, from their resources.

I am aware that large land grants and that large grants of money derived from the sales of the public lands have been voted, and of valuable property, for various purposes, but I do not believe that the authority was derived or could be properly derived from this clause of the Constitution which we are now considering. This clause must be construed in connection with the other provisions of the Constitution, and I have endeavored to show that the disposition of the public lands can only be made in the execution of the powers and for the purposes set forth in the grants of powers in the Constitution, and that it can not be held in any case to confer upon Congress any absolute and unlimited power.

I have thus endeavored to show that the position of the Senator from Texas with respect to his interpretation of clause 2, section 3, article 4 of the Constitution was not tenable, and I think a consideration of the consequences of that interpretation would more fully perhaps expose its fallacy. Under such a construction the Louisiana territory, a third larger than the whole area of the Union at the time of the purchase, might be held to-day as a dependency over which the Federal Government might still be exercising an imperial and absolute power, and to this domain we might in time add Mexico and Canada and thus set up over the greater part of this continent and of the people a Government as unrestrained as that of Russia. It can not in the nature of things be that the Constitution, which was ordained to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, and to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, could be made the basis for the establishment of such a gigantic system of unlimited power that would be as fatal to the liberties of those who should exercise it as it would be debasing to the subjects of it.

We come now to the consideration of what are called the eighteen enumerated powers of the Constitution, and I will say at the outset that if the authority for this legislation is not to be found in the first clause of section 8, article 1 of the Constitution, I am at a loss to find it anywhere. The section reads as follows:

> The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

I have endeavored to show that the lands or other property constitute one of the sources of the resources and revenues of the Government and can only be applied to the purposes and in the execution of the powers conferred by the Constitution. The other source of its revenue is the power given under this section which I have read. I undertake to say that not an acre of land nor one dollar of the revenues of the United States derived from any source whatever, whether it be from the sales of its lands or other property or from the taxes, can be appropriated in any manner or for any purpose except as provided for in the eighteen enumerated powers of the Constitution.

Three different constructions have been suggested of this clause of the Constitution: first, that it contains a grant of power to do whatever Congress may regard as necessary or proper to provide for the common defense and general welfare; secondly, that the words "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare" are a limitation upon the power to lay taxes; thirdly, that they do not exist as a limitation, but that they contain no real significance and constitute a sort of supplementary preamble or summary indicating in general terms for what purposes the enumerated powers that follow may be exerted.

It is not necessary to discuss the first interpretation, because if such a power were conferred upon Congress the power to exercise any jurisdiction that within its discretion it might deem proper to provide for the common defense and general welfare would in fact nullify and render useless, utterly useless, any other grants of power as being superfluous. It would indeed establish a government without limits or restraints. I can not help but regard the third interpretation as equally faulty and unwarranted. The general purposes for which the Constitution was ordained and established are set forth by the framers where they should be properly found in the well-known preamble which stands like a magnificent façade of Corinthian columns to the temple that they were about to dedicate to liberty.

Every part of the Constitution bears some relation to the whole and gives a harmonious symmetry and proportion to all its parts as perfect as the work of the architect of the Pantheon itself. No word is without a meaning. There is no repetition, there is nothing superfluous, and it will be remarked that the language in the preamble is appropriate to its place, namely, "to promote the general welfare," but that when the Constitution comes to make its grants of power the whole eighth section and all its clauses is used for that purpose and that alone. Different language is employed, but language appropriate. It is no longer "to promote the general welfare," but "to provide for the common defense and general welfare."

The general welfare may be promoted and was intended to be promoted by every article and every section and every clause in the Constitution, but the general welfare can be more properly "provided for" by the exercise of the power of taxation, by which means and supplies may be obtained. The history of the proceedings of the convention with respect to this phrase indicate that it had a definite meaning and that it was not inserted by accident but by design and for a necessary purpose, and therefore any construction which renders these words meaningless and superfluous, and is in effect equivalent to expunging them from the Constitution, must create a doubt against its correctness. It was said by the distinguished Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] that these words were discovered by the framers of the Constitution and that they were employed by them as I have before observed to indicate merely, to point out the way to the enumerated powers which follow. No phrase in our language has a more ancient and honorable origin or a clearer or more definite historical signification. It grew out of Magna Charta itself, which, as Senators will remember, was confirmed upward of thirty times by kings and parliaments.

In the reign of Edward I, in order to protect the people from the sovereigns' right to levy taxes at their will and to extort subsidies to supply their prodigalities, a statute was enacted entitled confirmatio chartarum, that all private property should be secured from royal spoliation and placed under the safeguard of the great council of all the realm. It reads as follows:

Moreover we have granted for us and our heirs as well to archbishops, bishops, abbots, and other folks of holy church as to earls, barons, and to all the commonalty of the land that from no business from henceforth we shall take such manner of aids, tasks, nor prices but by the common consent of all the realm and for the common profit—the general welfare "thereof."

And from that day to this the greatest struggles among English-speaking people have been to secure their earnings, not for particular classes and special interests, but for the common profit, the general welfare of the whole people. This phrase was found in the project of the constitution itself offered by Edmund Randolph, which, as we all know, was the germ out of which grew the Constitution under which we live. But, strange as it may appear, the first draught of the Constitution, which was presented by the committee of five on August 5, 1787, omitted these words, and perhaps the Constitution as it then stood on that day would justify the construction which Senators are placing upon it now, or that other interpretation which would leave the power to lay and collect taxes unlimited and absolute.

On the 25th of August, 1787, Mr. Randolph moved an amendment for its insertion in the Constitution, but it was defeated on a vote of ten States in the negative and one in the affirmative. Finally the committee of revision restored these words to the Constitution, and when it was adopted in the following form on the 17th day of September, 1787, "Done in convention by the unanimous consent of the States present," which declaration was signed by the members of the convention, these words were found in it, and have remained and will remain until they are expunged by an amendment to the Constitution. They constitute a limitation upon the powers of taxation. Taxes may be laid to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and the general welfare. To tax for these purposes, to raise money for these purposes, is not an undefined and unlimited power of discretion. The power to tax is unquestionably unlimited, for it is within the discretion of Congress to say how much money shall be raised, but the power of appropriation is limited to pay the debts, to provide for the common defense and general welfare. This construction of the Constitution was the one adopted early in the history of the Government, and has been steadily adhered to.

Mr. Justice Story says, section 922:

A power to lay taxes for any purpose whatsoever is a general power. A power to lay taxes for certain specific purposes is a limited power. A power to lay taxes for the common defense and general welfare of the United States is not in common sense a general power. It is limited to those objects. It can not constitutionally transcend them. If the defense proposed by a tax be not the common defense of the United States, if the welfare be not general, but special or local, as contradistinguished from national, it is not within the scope of the Constitution. The power then is under such circumstances necessarily a qualified power. If it is so, how then does it affect or in the slightest degree trench upon the other enumerated powers? No one will pretend that the power to lay taxes would in general have superseded or rendered unnecessary all the other enumerated powers. It would neither enlarge nor qualify them. The power to tax does not include them. No one will pretend that the power to lay a tax necessarily includes the power to declare war, to pass naturalization and bankrupt laws, to coin money, to establish post-offices, or to define piracies or felonies on the high seas.

It is said if Congress may lay taxes for the common defense and general welfare the money may be appropriated for those purposes, although not within the scope of the other enumerated powers. Certainly it may be so appropriated, for if Congress is authorized to lay taxes for such purposes it would be strange if when raised the money could not be applied to them. That would be to give a power for a certain end and then deny the end intended by the power.

Mr. Monroe submitted a message to Congress on the general subject of internal improvements May 14, 1822, and I presume it embodied the views of his Cabinet, which was then composed of John C. Calhoun, John Quincy Adams, William H. Crawford, besides other distinguished statesmen, who must have concurred in the opinions expressed in this state paper:

A power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises subjects to the call of Congress every branch of the public revenue, internal and external, and the addition to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare gives the right of applying the money raised; that is, of appropriating it to the purposes specified according to a proper construction of the terms.

It imposes no burden on the people, nor can it act on them in a sense to take power from the States, or in any sense in which power can be controverted or become a question between the two governments. The application of money raised under a lawful power is a right or grant which may be abused. It may be applied partially among the States or to improper purposes in our foreign and domestic concerns; but still it is a power not felt in the sense of other powers, since the only complaint which any State can make of such partiality and abuse is that some other State or States have obtained greater benefits from the application than by a just rule of apportionment they were entitled to. The right of appropriation is therefore from its nature secondary and incidental to the right of raising money, and it was proper to place it in the same grant and same clause with that right.

The last part of this grant, which provides that all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States, furnishes another strong proof that it was not intended that the second part should constitute a distinct grant in the sense above stated or convey any other right than that of appropriation.

It is contended on the one side that as the National Government is a government of limited powers it has no right to expend money except in the performance of acts authorized by the other specific grants according to a strict construction of their powers; that this grant in neither of its branches gives to Congress discretionary power of any kind, but is a mere instrument in its hands to carry into effect the powers contained in the other grants. To this construction I was inclined in the more early stages of our Government, but on further reflection and observation my mind has undergone a change for reasons which I will frankly unfold.

If, then, the right to raise and appropriate the public money is not restricted to the expenditures under the other specific grants according to a strict construction of their powers respectively, is there no limitation to it? Have Congress a right to raise and appropriate the public money to any and to every purpose according to their will and pleasure? They certainly have not. The Government of the United States is a limited government instituted for great national purposes, and for those only.

It is believed that there is not a corporation in the United States which does not exercise great discretion in the application of the money raised by it to the purposes of its institutions. It would be strange if the Government of the United States, which was instituted for such important purposes and endowed with such extensive powers, should not be allowed at least equal discretion and authority. The evil to be particularly avoided is the violation of States rights, showing that it seems to be reasonable and proper that the powers of Congress should be so construed as that the General Government in its intercourse with other nations and in our internal concerns should be able to adopt all such measures lying within the fair scope and intended to facilitate the direct objects of its powers as the public welfare may require and as sound and provident policy dictate.

Mr. Calhoun spoke as follows in the House of Representatives February 4, 1817:

The first power delegated to Congress is comprised in these words: "To lay and collect taxes," &c. First the power is given to lay taxes, next the objects are enumerated to which the money accruing from the exercise of this power may be applied, namely, to pay the debts, provide for the defense, and promote the general welfare; and last the rule for laying the taxes is prescribed, to wit, that all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform. If the framers had intended to limit the use of the money to the powers afterward enumerated and defined, nothing could have been more easy than to have expressed it plainly. I know it is the opinion of some that the words "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare," which I have just cited, were not intended to be referred to the power of laying taxes contained in the first part of the section, but that they are to be understood as distinct and independent powers granted in general terms, and are qualified by a more detailed enumeration of powers in the subsequent part of the Constitution.

If such were in fact the meaning intended, surely nothing can be conceived more bungling and awkward than the manner in which the framers have communicated their intention. If it were their intention to make a summary of the powers of Congress in general terms which were afterward to be particularly defined and enumerated, they should have told us so plainly and distinctly; and if the words "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare" were intended for this summary, they should have headed the list of our powers and it should have been stated that to effect the general objects the following specific powers were granted. I ask members to read the section with attention, and it will, I conceive, plainly appear that such could not have been the intention. The whole section seems to me to be about taxes. It plainly commences and ends with it, and nothing could be more strained than to suppose that the intermediate words "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare" were to be taken as independent and distinct powers. Forced, however, as such a construction was, I might admit it and urge that the words do constitute a part of the enumerated powers. The Constitution gives to Congress the power to establish post-offices and post-roads. I know the interpretation usually given to these words confines our powers to that of designating only the post-roads; but it seems to me that the word "establish" comprehends something more. But suppose the Constitution to be silent, why should we be confined in the application of moneys to the enumerated powers? There is nothing in the reason of the thing that I can perceive why it should be so restricted; and the habitual and uniform practice of the Government coincides with my opinion. Our laws are full of instances of money appropriated without any reference to the enumerated powers. We granted by a unanimous vote, or nearly so, $50,000 to the distressed inhabitants of Caracas and a very large sum at two different times to the St. Domingo refugees. If we are restricted in the use of our money to the enumerated powers, on what principle can the purchase of Louisiana be justified? To pass over many other instances, the identical power which is now the subject of discussion has in several instances been exercised. To look no further back, at the last session a considerable sum was granted to complete the Cumberland road. In reply to this uniform course of legislation, I expect it will be said that our Constitution is founded on positive and written principles and not on precedents. I do not deny the position; but I have introduced these instances to prove the uniform sense of Congress and the country (for they have not been objected to) as to our powers; and surely they furnish better evidence of the true interpretation of the Constitution than the most refined and subtle arguments.

That Congress possesses the power to appropriate money, raised by taxation or otherwise, for other purposes, in their discretion, than those pointed out in the enumerated powers, is a question that has given rise to very able and acute discussions; and the affirmative side of the question has been sustained and successfully vindicated by the practice of the Government, and the weighty authority, among others, of Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Monroe, in celebrated documents under their official sanction.

It may be asked, is there then no limit to the responsibility of Congress? I answer, unhesitatingly, that the responsibility is to the people, and in the frequency of elections. It will not do to say the power does not exist because of its liability to abuse, for all powers of the Government are subject to the same infirmity, but when the people have framed a constitution we can neither enlarge nor abridge it on the ground of inconvenience or because we may regard some of its provisions as unwise or impolitic. The Constitution must stand as it is written, and not as we would write it now.

I will not weary the Senate with any longer discussion of the constitutional aspects of the question, nor will I cite any further from the commentators thereon or from the speeches of the distinguished statesmen who have been engaged in the administration of the Government. Let us discover if we can the pathway on which the Government for the last hundred years has actually moved.

Let us see not what has been written or said, but what has been actually done by the Government, operating through its House of Representatives, its Senate, and its Executive. Surely the acts of the concurring Departments for so long a period of time must command the respect of every man even with the most limited experience and with the least practical acquaintance with the grave affairs of the administration of a government so powerful and august as this. The policy of a government determined by settled maxims and fixed in its habits and methods and confirmed and approved by the people for a hundred years must be considered as a development of its organic and constitutional life.

One of the first acts of this Government was to afford aid in the enforcement of the quarantine laws of the States as early as in 1797, with the view of preserving the health by aiding States in their efforts in this respect. The statistics show that more than one hundred million acres of lands have been donated to the States for education, and I need hardly refer to the distribution of the surplus revenue among the States in 1836, and again the distribution of the public land revenue and assumption of the State debts in 1841, when we find a bill for such purpose carried by such leading statesmen as Clay, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Mangum, Porter, Rives, John Q. Adams, R. C. Winthrop, and others.

When General La Fayette visited America in 1824 he was not only welcomed with every demonstration of enthusiastic affection, but Congress added substantial rewards by voting him $200,000 and 24,000 acres of fertile land in Florida; and who can estimate the amounts that we have paid out in pensions and in bounties since the establishment of the Government? Under what one of the enumerated powers can be found authority for the exercise of the revenue power, for the protection to American industries, or to pay bounties to fishermen or pensions to soldiers, or to adopt the navigation laws, or to establish courts beyond the sea, or a department of agriculture, or of fish culture, or national cemeteries, or to participate in expositions, or to make grants of lands or money to railroads, to blind asylums, or to endow colleges or universities? These things have been done, and all this legislation falls either outside of the Constitution, unless it is within under the first clause of section 8, article 1 of the Constitution, or derived by straining other clauses beyond all bounds.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] in his able and interesting speech yesterday upon the tariff declared that there was no warrant in the Constitution, if I understood him, for protection, and I agree with him fully if he means that it is not to be found in the enumerated powers of the Constitution. Does the distinguished Senator mean to say that the Government has been administered for the last one hundred years by administration after administration in daily and yearly violations of the Constitution? For since the first tariff bill introduced by Mr. Madison himself protection has been afforded American industry. The act introduced by him July 4, 1789, declared that "whereas it is necessary for the support of the Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures that duties be laid," &c.

I do not say whether it has been incidental or otherwise. As a matter of fact, there never has been a tariff bill on our statute-books that did not afford protection. Even the tariff of Robert J. Walker, which is called a free-trade tariff, discriminated in favor of American productions and manufactures, and the very form of the bill which I have quoted above, introduced by Mr. Madison, shows that he derived the power to protect American industries from the general-welfare clause; that is, from the first clause of section 8 of article 1. The question I submit is not whether the protection shall be small or large, incidental or direct, but whether there be any constitutional protection at all in any degree and measure. I agree with the Senator that there can be no constitutional protection whatever unless it be found in the general-welfare clause; and if it be not lodged there, the whole history of the Government with respect to the tariff has been a series of flagrant violations of the Constitution, in fact a lawless usurpation.

I hope the Senator from Kentucky will pardon me if I invite his attention to the celebrated address to the States by Mr. Madison in favor of raising the revenue by a tax on imports, in which he declares "that taxes on consumption are always least burdensome because they are least felt, and are borne, too, by those who are willing and able to pay them, and that of all taxes on consumption those on foreign commerce are most compatible with the genius and policy of free states." I do not mean to say, Mr. President, that there are no abuses under the system of tariff taxation and that it ought not to be revised, and that it could not be lowered with safety and benefit to the American people, but perhaps I may take this occasion to observe that I believe that the burdens and inequalities, nay, even the outrages, of the internal-revenue system are greater at the present moment than those which the Senator himself has so eloquently depicted. The abuse of the tariff system has unquestionably led to the creation of monopolies, which impose heavy burdens upon the general public and add largely to taxation, while yielding little or no revenue.

But I can not shut my eyes to the fact that the internal-revenue system has also created gigantic monopolies in the interest of manufacturers, while it deprives many of the States of this Union of sources of revenue that belong properly to the people of them, and that if not diverted would pour forth a plenteous stream of wealth to fill their depleted exchequers and to fertilize their exhausted energies and war-wasted fields; a system of administration that is maintained at an immense cost by an army of partisan officials and spies, and by the enforcement of laws and regulations violative of all our notions of personal liberty, of freedom, of labor, and the inviolability of home and fireside.

It must be clear to every one who has given attention to our taxing systems as at present applied that not a single step can be taken toward the reform of the tariff with a view to revenue and not protection which will not result in largely increasing the receipts of the Government. And I am therefore at a loss to understand how the advocates of revenue reform for the purpose of reducing taxation insist upon maintaining the highest rates upon articles that yield little or no revenue to the Treasury, while they afford large bounties to the manufacturer, and at the same time reduce the rates on articles which may be called revenue articles, yielding large revenues to the Government and little or no bounty. Nor can I understand why it is that the revenue reformers should insist upon keeping up internal taxation which would be wholly unnecessary upon an intelligent reformation of the tariff the effect of which is to create monopolies as indefensible as those which are produced by the tariff system. But extremes meet.

The advocates of the manufacturers, who are enjoying large bounties at the expense of the people and block the way to reform, join the defenders of whisky and tobacco manufacturers to prevent any reduction on these articles in the interest of the producers, and both propose to unite in putting upon the free-list those very articles that now yield the largest revenues to the Government. A reduction of the tariff will not reduce taxation unless it is made upon articles on which the present rates are so high that they are rich in bounties but afford little or no revenue, and a reduction on these articles will therefore increase the revenues. But if a reduction is made upon articles that yield a large revenue and little or no bounty a reduction may be made in the receipts of the Government, but taxation will be increased. Is the object merely to reduce revenues or is it to reduce taxation and the burdens that are placed upon the people? It will be observed that every dollar collected from revenue articles goes into the Treasury and back to the people. They get the benefit of the tax. The articles upon which the rates are high or prohibitory yield large bounties to the favorite few, but pay nothing into the Treasury and constitute a heavy burden upon the people.

The defects and abuses of the tariff system can only be removed without doing injustice by a careful consideration of all its details and by adhering strictly to the rule of looking to a reduction of taxation as well as of revenues. A blind and heedless attack may work a revolution but not a reform, and produce the very opposite results from those which are really desired. The evils of the inland taxation I will not now undertake to point out, but I concur with the observations of Mr. Madison in his celebrated reply to the Rhode Island objections, December 17, 1782, "that taxes on possessions and the articles of our own growth or manufacture, whether in the form of a land tax, excise, or any other, are more hurtful to trade than impost duties."

But I refer to this matter only to call the attention of the Senate to the construction of the Constitution insisted upon, as I understand it, both by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD], which does not allow to Congress any power from the first section of article 8. I insist that their arguments in defense of this position are addressed not so much to a consideration of the Constitution itself as to the abuses which have grown up and are likely to grow up by the exertion of any power under the general-welfare clause, and I have shown that the tariff system has stood from the very beginning on a power that they deny. It appears to me that they construe the Constitution rather as they would have it than to ascertain what it really is—the lex scripta.

The limited and narrow construction on which they stand is that which was advocated in the defense of the peculiar institution of the South when stress of circumstances, the peace and safety of Southern society, the security of property and life in that section induced Southern statesmen to place the strictest construction upon the Constitution and to extend to the utmost the reserved powers of the States. I beg now to call attention of the Senate to the fact that the construction which the opponents of this measure place on the Federal Constitution is precisely that which was adopted by the statesmen of the South when they formed a constitution for the late confederacy. In lieu of the first clause of section 8 of the Constitution of the United States they adopted the following in the convention which assembled at Montgomery:

> The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises for revenue necessary to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and carry on the government of the Confederate States; but no bounties shall be granted from the treasury, nor shall any duties or taxes on importations from foreign nations be laid to promote or foster any branch of industry, and all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the Confederate States.

Here you will observe that it was deemed necessary to leave out the clause to provide for the general welfare, and expressly to deny authority to grant bounties or to promote or foster any branch of industry. It will not do therefore to say that a constitution with these forbidden clauses in means precisely what a constitution does from which they are rejected.

I think I have now shown to the satisfaction of every candid and reflecting man that there is constitutional authority for the Congress of the United States to make a grant of land or of money to any purpose clearly within the general welfare; as for instance, to aid the States in the education of the people therein. It is admitted by the opponents of this bill that the Government may make a grant of lands or of the proceeds from the sales of the public lands. They insist that such a grant does not carry with it the jurisdiction of the Government. But they contend that a grant of money derived from taxation for any purpose carries along with it the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, and that by the passage of this bill the officers of the Federal Government will be entitled to follow the money into the State, to take charge of the schools, to appoint the teachers, and to direct the studies of the children, and in fact to administer the grant in all its details and put in peril every safeguard of local self-government.

I must confess that it has been impossible for me to make the distinction between these different grants, and while the proposition has been again and again pressed upon the attention of Senators I have not heard a single reason given to show that the extent of the jurisdiction of the Government depends upon the kind of grant that is made. If it be a grant of land or of money from the sale of land, jurisdiction is not carried by such a grant into and over the States, but if it be of money from taxation then the jurisdiction necessary goes along with it. Upon what reason or authority can such a conclusion be based? I can see none. There is none. The very character of the beneficiaries of the grant terminates the jurisdiction of the Federal Government when it is complete. All schools of learning, free schools, scholars in universities, are among the charities enumerated in the statute of Elizabeth, and from that day to this the law has always in this country recognized all trusts, donations, or grants for the benefit and uses of schools and colleges as gifts for a charitable object, and it must be clear that the Government, from the very nature of the transaction, parts from its jurisdiction when it parts with the property by executing the donation or grant. And it has not been shown, for it can not be shown, how a donation or grant of any kind extends the jurisdiction of the Government. No single instance has been mentioned of the invasion of the States, their reserved rights, or their liberties under the guise of a grant.

I believe that if the Senators who at the outset of this debate expressed doubts as to the disposition of the Southern people to deal fairly in the application of this fund had read over the testimony of the distinguished educators who have traveled through the Southern States and made themselves familiar with the sentiments of the people, they would do themselves the justice to dismiss all apprehensions as groundless and unworthy. I can not believe the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], who has been so long connected with public affairs, will shut his eyes to the bright record which has been placed before the Senate by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], as well as the Senators from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR and Mr. GEORGE] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON], exhibiting the zealous devotion of the people of the South to the cause of popular education and the large sums that they annually tax themselves to educate not only their own children but the children of their former slaves.

Hear what Hon. J. H. Smith, a native of New Hampshire and for many years superintendent of public instruction of Indiana, says:

> My opinion is that the Southern people are willing to do all they can to cure this great evil and remove this great wrong, and, so far as I have observed, the work that has been done under existing circumstances has been a marvelous work. The Southern people have made a heroic effort certainly in three or four States that I have visited to do the best that could be done for these colored people. I want to say that throughout the length and breadth of the Southern States, without one exception, the colored people are given the same advantages that the white people are given. And I believe, from what I saw, that we are able to trust the existing State organizations represented by these gentlemen; we are able to trust them with whatever means we can appropriate, and I speak after some investigation and after deliberation.

I must forbear to weary the Senate with testimony on this point, and I will offer only one or two more witnesses out of the many hundreds qualified by actual observation to speak.

And now I invite the attention of Senators to the remarks of Rev. Dr. J. L. McCurry, general agent of the trustees of the Peabody fund:

> With probably the most extensive acquaintance with school officers in the South possessed by any man in the Union, acquired by personal intercourse with them, I make bold to affirm that no departments of government have better qualified, more patriotic, more trustworthy, more enlightened administrators. What is needed for success in making education universal is not severe Federal supervision, subordination of State school to central authority, but a well guarded and adequate appropriation of money.

Hon. Hugh Thompson, formerly superintendent of public instruction of South Carolina, and now governor of that renowned Commonwealth, says:

> I will call the attention of the committee to the fact that there are now in the Southern States about 5,000,000 children ready and needing the opportunity of education. It would take at the lowest calculation $30,000,000 to furnish the opportunities of education to our children in the South. Gentlemen, I say as one knowing the spirit of the people, and knowing their limited resources, that we have not the means to furnish this education.

I beg now to call attention to a brief quotation from one whose name the accomplished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has honored by coupling it with Horace Mann, of Massachusetts, the pioneer of public education in that State. Hear what Rev. Dr. A. D. Mayo, of Massachusetts, says:

> Practically, within ten years every one of these Southern States has put on its statute-book a system of public schools; practically, within this time every district of country in the South has received something that can be called a school. This school public, as we may call it, consisting of State officers, of school officers, of superior teachers, of thoughtful people all over the South, is to my mind the most forcible, the most persistent, the most devoted school public now in any part of the world. There is no body of superior teachers doing so much work for so little pay and under such great disadvantages as in the South today. There is no minority of people working so hard to overcome this terrible calamity of illiteracy anywhere in the world to-day as in the South. I give this as the deliberate result of two years of observation in twelve States.

Could testimony be stronger?

I will be pardoned if I refer for one moment to my own State. I desire to invite attention to the observations of the superintendent of the public schools of New Orleans, a gentleman of the highest order of capacity, who has devoted his life to the cause of education and who reflects the sentiments and aspirations of the people of Louisiana. Hon. William O. Rogers says:

> I know of no feeling antagonistic to the education of the negro. On the contrary, there is a growing opinion, so far as I can judge, in favor of extending to that class of our people the fullest and fairest opportunities. The kindly spirit which characterizes the relation of the two races in this city and State extends to their respective schools. There are no contentions or animosities. Teachers of equal grade are sent sometimes to the schools of colored pupils, or again to the whites, and I know of no hardships to which colored pupils are exposed by means of insufficient funds in which the whites do not equally share.

Again:

> What would national aid do for Louisiana? It would enable parish school boards to open schools where there are none now for want of funds. It would prolong the sessions of schools which are now kept open for one, two, or three months only. It would draw large numbers of children from idleness and ignorance to the school buildings, and it would enable school boards and other authorities to employ trained, competent teachers, who should be paid reasonable salaries. Without education we have unskilled labor, a discontented class of society, thriftless, heedless, with brutal passions and degrading vices, ready when roused by fanaticism or demagogism to hurl against the peace of society or the best institutions of the country a compact and powerful voting minority which already holds the balance of power between the two great political parties of the country.

Sir, this is not only the testimony of a philanthropic scholar as to the state of sentiment among the people of Louisiana, but his observations upon the ill effects of ignorance and the perils with which it menaces the peace and stability of society are worthy of the most enlightened statesman. Mr. President, I will quote no more. Why should I multiply testimony when I have but to appeal to the constitutions and laws of the Southern States to vindicate them from every charge of discrimination or indifference?

In my opinion, the most hopeful sign of the times is the profound and universal enthusiasm in favor of the education of the people throughout the Republic, and nowhere has this sentiment taken a stronger hold than upon the people of Louisiana. Besides raising a large sum by taxation from resources that are hard pressed with the never-ending battle against the great river that is to them what the sea is to Holland, there has been recently formed among the wealthiest and most public-spirited citizens of that State a corporation, styled the "Louisiana Educational Society," for the purpose of collecting means by voluntary contributions to aid in the establishment and extension of schools to educate the children, without distinction of race or color.

I have heard, sir, of many such corporations having been formed for the conduct of enterprises for individual profit, and even for the higher object of founding academies, colleges, and universities, but I venture to say that this is the first instance in this country or in any other where the leading citizens, not of a single city but of a whole State, have united their energies and resources in a corporate form, not to build a railway, not to establish a bank or a line of steamers, not, in fact, for their individual advancement or benefit, but to spread the blessings of education among the poor children of the Commonwealth.

The gentlemen engaged in this beneficent work are worthy to rank with the founders of cities and States, and to be the countrymen of Paul Tulane, who has crowned the close of a long and honorable life by dedicating his fortune to the establishment of a university in New Orleans, to use his own words, "for the promotion and encouragement of intellectual, moral, and industrial education, and for the advancement of learning and letters, the arts and sciences." Among the benefactors of mankind—the Peabodys, the Johns Hopkinses, the Corcorans—the name of Tulane will shine with resplendent luster, brighter and brighter from generation to generation, as long as free government or letters or sciences find a votary in Louisiana or the sentiment of gratitude a lodgment in the human breast.

I appeal now to the candor of Senators if such a people are not only worthy of trust but of sympathy and admiration—a people whose government not only taxes them, but who, like the pelican, which is their emblem, take freely from their own substance and life-blood to educate and nourish their young.

I am not here, sir, on their behalf to solicit favors nor to catch the crumbs that may fall from the table of a paternal government, and certainly not to indulge in appeals to the bitter memories or controversies of the past, still less to make any apologies; but I am here as an American Senator, to do all I can in a proper and legitimate manner for the welfare and advancement of the American people.

Under my interpretation of the Constitution I am justified in voting for this bill, because I believe that the general education of the people and the diffusion of knowledge are the surest reliance to correct the evils in our political and social conditions, and to preserve and maintain these institutions of free government. Who can tell how many young minds may lie buried like precious stones and gems in darkness and neglect that by the spread of light may be brought forth to direct the councils of state, or to exalt the hearts of the people with songs of divine melody, or to enlarge the realm of civilization by still prouder conquests from the secrets of nature, or who may perhaps discover new and better guarantees for the rights of men and the guardianship of liberty—minds emulous to aid the generous aspirations of the people after

Nobler modes of life,
With sweeter manners, purer laws.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VOORHEES in the chair). The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] to recommit the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I should be at a great disadvantage in the presentation of my views on this question if my purpose was to enlighten the Senate or the country either on the question of constitutional law involved in this great bill, for we have been listening with great attention and with every opportunity for instruction for the better part of three weeks to the opinions expressed by the most profound constitutional lawyers in this body upon the proposition whether we have the authority to pass the bill. So I will be content to inform my constituents of my reasons for the vote I will give.

The measure is the most magnificent in its proportions that was ever brought into the Senate of the United States. It is the first bill in which there is sought to be made an appropriation exceeding $100,000,000 by a single act for a specific purpose, and that not a governmental purpose, but a purpose, I may safely style it, of charity or of public benevolence, of public improvement, public cultivation. A measure having for its purpose the bettering of the condition of the private citizen, the mere unit, the atom in our great body politic.

One hundred and five millions of dollars to be appropriated by a single act of Congress is the broadest proposition that has ever been presented to the consideration of American statesmanship; and when that sum of money is required for a single generation of people, to say nothing of the repetition of this and other greater sums that we may be forced to supply for the cultivation of succeeding generations of people, we must recognize the fact that we are laying broader foundations for benevolence and charity by this act than have ever been attempted by any act of the American Congress.

The Legislatures of the States, so far as I am informed, have none of them instructed their representatives, or even advised them, that they should come here and appropriate $105,000,000 out of the Treasury for the purpose of public education. Not only have I not received such instructions from the Legislature of Alabama, but I have received no expression of opinion from the people of that State of any important or general character which would lead me to believe that they had prepared themselves for the introduction and the passage of this great measure at this time.

The measure has been received in the Senate on both sides of the Chamber, without respect of party and without respect of sectional divisions, with rather a cold welcome, especially among some at least of the older members of this body. They are afraid that they do not possess the constitutional power to do that which is required of them by the bill. I think the opinions which have been uttered in the Senate indicate at least that there is a very large division, if not about an equal division, of opinion upon the grave question of the constitutional power of Congress to pass this proposed law.

As the subject is new, as it is important, as it is very far reaching in its scope, it would seem to be a wiser policy to defer final action upon this measure until the people have been consulted throughout this great Union to ascertain whether they are willing that Congress shall exercise this new and hitherto untried power of appropriating money out of the Treasury of the United States for the education of their children.

We have also made great progress during this session of Congress in the Senate in the passage of important bills. I am informed that we have passed now more than one hundred and sixty bills, which lie upon the Speaker's table in the House of Representatives. Only thirteen of our bills have so far been considered in that body, and four of the joint resolutions we have passed out of eleven. This admonishes me that while the great length of time spent in this debate is not wasted, for it has been, I dare say, of great instruction to the people, it will be futile during this session of Congress, for the House of Representatives, we must understand, with the accumulation of business that it now has before it and with the appropriation bills still incomplete in that body, can scarcely give such attention to this subject as to warrant it in passing final judgment upon it at this session.

We are admonished also by various amendments that are put in here by Senators that the bill is not satisfactory in its details to many of them. The Committee on Education and Labor have given to it grave consideration, but they have discovered in the progress of the debate many infirmities in the bill which they themselves confess ought to be remedied by some amendment, and other Senators have suggested very important arrangements for the management and disposition of this fund, for its distribution between the States, some upon the basis of illiteracy and some upon the basis of population, differing entirely from the suggestions made by the committee.

I would content myself with a vote to recommit the bill, as it unquestionably should be recommitted, but for the fact that I have no expectation that any amendment that will be put upon the bill will make it more acceptable to me. The amendments, on the contrary, in the direction that they have taken indicate a purpose to make the measure a machine or an engine of control of the States by Congress in the administration of this fund. Those Senators who have offered amendments to the bill have not offered them in the direction of restraining the power of Congress in the management of this fund after it shall have reached the States, but to the reverse, their amendments nearly all looking to the proposition that Congress shall retain larger power over the school fund than the committee have retained for it in the bill as they have reported it.

Hence I have no expectation that the bill will be put into any better shape than it is now, so far as my views of it are concerned, by any amendment that may be offered or that may be passed in the Senate. Yet I shall be disappointed if some of the friends of the bill, on this side of the Chamber, in their eagerness to get hold of the money which now stands so temptingly before us will not yield very much more than they have done in committee, or than they have done in their speeches, to the demand of Congress to control this fund after it shall have reached the States in which it is to be expended. That is the drift of sentiment on this question. When we have laid the foundations of this new assumption of power in this bill, as proposed by the committee, with such amendments as may be ingrafted upon it by a compromise or concession between the gentlemen on this side of the Chamber and the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, we shall then find ourselves in the opening march of that great progress toward thorough centralization which will result in the overturning of those conservative views of government which have always characterized the great party of which I happen to be an humble member.

It may be thought necessary for the general welfare that that conservative political organization should disband, but I am not prepared for that result as yet.

Mr. President, I say it in no offensive sense, but if there was not $100,000,000 in the Treasury to-day, and if there was not a tax system yoked down upon the shoulders of the people of the United States which will yield a hundred million surplus revenue annually until we repeal or amend it, I venture to say that this bill would never have received one hour's consideration in this body. If the revenues of the United States Government had been limited to the necessary purposes of government alone, and if we were deriving through our tax system no more revenue than is necessary to execute the great purposes of the Government, if we had a treasury which emptied itself regularly for the purpose of supplying the Government with its needed resources for expenditure, this bill would never have fluttered upon the table of the President except in its death agony. It would have been passed by as an idle declaration in respect of the powers of Congress, having no immediate fruit to be distributed through the votes of Senators in this body, and therefore no useful purpose. But I feel, and every Senator here must feel, that we are standing to-day in the presence a great temptation, a temptation that I would rid myself of for two reasons, first, personal to myself as an inducement to be extravagant and wasteful in the use of revenues collected from an overtaxed people to pay a public debt and to get the country from beneath the terrible difficulties engendered by war; and a temptation to take part in a propaganda of benevolence which appeals to the warmest sympathies of my nature.

It is not necessary for me to announce upon the floor of the Senate that I am the friend of education. I have sufficiently experienced its wants to know its value. I was raised among a class of people who were compelled to work for their living and to educate themselves at the same time. While they are not a learned class of people they are still not ignorant. Many men who have been raised among them without the advantages which are now possessed by those who have an ordinary common-school education are now performing important public functions in the United States and elsewhere in the world. Whatever, therefore, would contribute to place within reach of their children the advantages of better education than their fathers had must appeal naturally to my warmest sympathies, although I may not feel that they will ever dishonor their unlettered fathers by their ignorance of the learning of the books. More than that, I have had the opportunity on the floor of the Senate of expressing my views on this question in former days both by speeches and by votes, and I have never failed to add what of encouragement I could to the cause of public education. I have only been careful to act within the limits of my duty in such matters.

Then, because a large proportion of the money which may be received under the bill by the State of Alabama may be applied to the education of the negro children who are in that State is a matter that also appeals to my personal sympathy and arouses within my heart a sentiment of strong desire that they should receive every advantage in this direction that we are capable of bestowing upon them. Not that I have realized in my experience (and therefore I must say solemnly I do not believe) that the South is in the calamitous condition that has been represented here by Senators who seemed to think that an argument drawn from the misery of their people is necessary to justify their course upon this bill.

I stand here to deny upon facts and figures this accusation against us of extreme and lamentable ignorance in the South. I realize that it must be better for any community in the world that every man, woman, and child in it should have the opportunity to learn, and should be capable of, reading and writing. In other words, it would be a blessing if every child should have the foundations of a good English education laid as far as may be by the exertions of his father, or his friends, and, as far as may be necessary, by additional assistance of the government under which he may reside. But the education of a child by the exertions of its parents is a twofold blessing, in which each is benefited and made better.

Nor, in rejecting this overture made to the people of the South through this broad act of benevolence, as it is alleged to be and as I have no right to assume that it is not, am I in the slightest degree moved by any feeling of jealousy, pride, or resentment, or any of the lingering hates, if there were hates, existing between us in former times. These reflections came to me as an embarrassment upon my conduct, for I am averse to standing upon punctilios, but they shall only make me more cautious in my action, and not less resolute. My motives may be misunderstood, but my votes here must have the approbation of my own conscience.

The bill appropriates $105,000,000 to the cause of public education in the United States, excluding some of the States from its provisions, those that have not 8 per cent. of the whole population who can not read or write, and it requires the Secretary of the Treasury upon certain certificates being made by the governors of the States to the Secretary of the Interior——

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator is confused by the recent reprint of the bill. He was correct in his first statement. It is $105,000,000 to all the States and Territories. He refers to the reprint with the proposed amendments, not amendments made but amendments suggested.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, I see it is the reprint.

Mr. BLAIR. The original bill is not in italics.

Mr. MORGAN. Upon a certificate made by the governor of the performance of certain acts by the Legislatures of the States, and by him also as the executive of the State, to the Secretary of the Interior and by the Secretary of the Interior to the Secretary of the Treasury, he is required to pay out the money annually on or before the 1st day of July each year, and that includes a period of ten years.

Now, let us see in a plain, practical, common-sense view of this question what this is. It is called an appropriation. I do not think that in the proper sense of the term "appropriation" we can take out of the Treasury by a bill now the money that is to be found in it ten years after date. The language is, "there shall be appropriated;" it should be "distributed." Suppose the bill should provide that the first installment of this money should be supplied out of the Treasury of the United States in the year 1900. That would scarcely be said to be within the purview of the power of this Congress, at least not within the usual practice. This is a distribution of money rather than an appropriation. A fund is to be called into the Treasury through the taxing power of the United States which the bill is to distribute among the States. If it were an appropriation it could well be challenged upon the ground that it was not an appropriation for a governmental purpose, but when we come to consider it nakedly as the truth is, it is the future distribution of a sum of money to be hereafter collected into the Treasury through such agencies of taxation as Congress has prescribed by law or may hereafter adopt. The act operates presently to distribute money that is to be gathered into the Treasury year after year until the whole sum has been raised and expended during a period of ten years to come.

Now, how is this money to be got? We say that this law shall take effect now. We say that the Secretary of the Treasury in the first year after its passage shall commence to expend the money, and then he shall expend $15,000,000. Where is the money to come from and in what way are we to get hold of it? This is a mere mortgage upon the resources of the Government. After the States have modified their legislation, as is required by the bill, so as to produce at least one-third of the amount of money that we appropriate during the first year, the arrangement may be said to have the nature of a contract between the Government and the States; and then if war shall come, if extraordinary expenditures shall be made necessary for ordinary governmental purposes during the period of ten years, we have got a mortgage by contract upon the Treasury of the United States for the distribution of this money for the period of ten years to come.

It becomes a debt that we must meet, for we appropriate it, distribute it now, and it becomes an obligation that rises to a higher dignity than a mere moral duty. It is a grant of money to the States that we can not in honor or justice recall.

How are we to get this money? Only in one of two ways under the Constitution, either by taxation or by borrowing it. Suppose I should put into the bill by way of amendment this provision: "Provided that the money that is to be distributed to the States shall be raised by being borrowed by the Congress of the United States." I would throw such a cloud over the bill by an amendment of that sort as that the people of the States would receive it with great reluctance if they received it at all, for they would see in a moment that their credit was to be pledged by Treasury certificates or bonds representing loans for the raising of money in future for distribution among the States. They would see that they were being burdened with debt as a means of compelling them to exceed their present tax-paying ability for the education of their own children. They would resent such compulsory methods of making them perform a natural duty.

When the old deposit act was passed and some $28,000,000 were distributed to the States, the money was in the Treasury. It was gotten rid of in that way because Congress could find no other way to get rid of it. We had no debts to pay, we had no prospect of war ahead of us which might absorb it, we had no great governmental works that we had projected which might take up that amount of money. It was there a dead surplus in the Treasury for distribution. This bill, being a bill for distribution and nothing but a bill for distribution, instead of distributing money in the Treasury distributes the credit of the people to the States during the period of ten years to come, as a means of compelling them to educate their children in the common schools.

Did Congress ever have the power to borrow money for the purpose of being distributed among the States? Did anybody ever conceive that Congress had the power to borrow money for a purpose like that? Yet that is this bill, for either we must maintain our power to tax this surplus out of the people for ten years to come, in order to meet the obligation at whatever expense to their personal welfare, or else we must resort to the borrowing power to provide means for compelling the people to contribute to the general welfare.

How is it that Senators, on this side of the Chamber, at least, could treat with levity the argument that was made yesterday by the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], a powerful and masterly argument against prolonging and keeping in force the taxing power of the present tariff, which is considered to be very unjust and very onerous? When he said that he was unwilling to rely upon that power to supply this money, and that the Congress of the United States should now meet the public demand for reducing taxation of every kind to the level of actual necessary expenditures by the Government, he stated a most important fact. And to that I will add that it must result that the $105,000,000 pledged in this bill must be raised by its being borrowed unless the country is to be ruined. We must either keep this onerous tariff upon the people in order to raise the money, or else we must go to borrowing in order to get the money for distribution.

That is the attitude of affairs, and this brings up questions reaching very much further into the subject than the mere volume of public debt or expenditure. It raises constitutional questions, and those of a very dangerous as well as of a very serious and important character. In the attempts which have been made to justify the passage of the bill it has been treated as a bill that appropriates the money as if it was now in hand, and the question has been asked, has not Congress the power to appropriate whatever may be in the Treasury, whether it comes from taxation, whether it comes from the sale of public lands, from fines or forfeitures, or from duties laid upon patent-rights or other things? Can Congress discriminate, asks one Senator, between a dollar on that side and a dollar on this side of the Treasury, and say we have the power to appropriate this and we have not the power to appropriate that? That was the reductio ad absurdum, I confess, but the absurdity lies further back than all that; it lies in the fact that we are pretending to ourselves that we are making an act of appropriation here and now to operate through ten years to come of money that we have not yet got in the Treasury, when the truth is that we are merely providing that we shall distribute whatever money may be in the Treasury among the States for the purpose of education, and go in debt if the money runs short.

In order to justify this measure, Senators have recently found an immense importance to be attached to what the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND], quoting from the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], calls the "blanket clause" of the Constitution, the general-welfare clause. If the Congress of the United States has the power to use that "blanket clause" whenever it pleases to justify any excesses in its own conduct, the Constitution of the United States is something that rests only in the discretionary will of Congress.

That is the Constitution under the "blanket clause" as Senators construe it, and not the Constitution handed down to us by our fathers, for if we have the right under this "vagrant clause" of "the general welfare" to determine the objects to which we will apply the money of the people, and also to determine the power which we possess to compel them to supply the money, and also to measure by our own will the control that necessarily belongs to the power that appropriates money over its distribution and application—if we have got all that in our reach and if we can conveniently fall back upon this "blanket clause" to justify our action, then there was no need of our fathers bequeathing to us liberties that are guarded, restricted, and preserved in a written Constitution. That "blanket clause" was all that could be necessary for the future action of the Government of the United States. All else was idle waste of words.

The will of Congress declaring what is "the general welfare," how much money it takes to supply "the general welfare," in what manner this money shall be used in supplying "the general welfare" down to the least particulars of its application, that, sir, is the constitution of the "blanket clause."

It was not that "blanket clause" that I was brought up to revere as the soul of the Constitution. I was brought up to believe that I had bequeathed to me in common with my countrymen at least a legacy of constitutional law and right and justice, limiting the powers of Congress as well as the powers of every other department of this Government. If the limitations upon the powers of Congress are stricken out, little matter is it to me whether I am under the despotism of a congress or the despotism of a king or an autocrat. There is not a body of civilized legislators in the universal world which claims to itself the power that has been claimed under the "blanket clause" of the Constitution by Democrats on this side of the Chamber. The most autocratic government on earth that pretends to have conceded to its subjects any rights whatever of a permanent, fixed, and organic character denies to itself the right to determine what is for the general welfare to the extent of enacting laws to take taxes and property from the people and apply them to suit itself, without question and without answer to anybody as to the purpose or manner of its application.

The term "general welfare," as found in the Constitution, must have some boundary. If the words have no boundary and no definition, they are the only terms in the Constitution that have none. If our fathers have left to us this unbridled and unlimited right of definition of Congressional power and have not given to us some authentic definition of what they meant when they put those words "to provide for the general welfare" in the Constitution, instead of having bequeathed to us constitutional liberty they have bequeathed to us merely the power of making slaves of the men whom we presume to represent upon this floor, and dependent provinces of the States which sent us here.

There must be some definition of the term "general welfare" as used in the Constitution. Where are we to look for it? This phrase is used twice, first in the preamble to the Constitution and afterward in connection with the taxing power. The great publicists of the past, the men who framed the Constitution itself, never pretended that the recital of the purposes for which the Government was formed in the caption of the Constitution which contains the term "the general welfare" was of itself any definition of the power of any part of the Government of the United States, either the legislative, the judicial, or the executive. Those words occur only once afterward, and that is in connection with the taxing power. It has been confessed in this debate, I believe on all sides and by almost everybody, that where they occur in connection with the taxing power they are intended as words of limitation upon the power of Congress to tax, not substantive grants of power for legislative purposes, but mere words of restraint upon the power of taxation.

Was there any reason appearing in the history of the ordination of the Constitution which gave to that view pertinency and force? You remember that under the Confederation no tax could be raised for war or peace to support the Government or for any purpose whatever except by the concurrent votes of nine States of the confederacy. When our fathers first united themselves into what we might call the nebulous form of government under the Articles of Confederation they expressly prohibited Congress from taxing the people of the States for the purpose of raising money for any purpose whatever unless nine States should concur. When they ordained this new form of government and instituted two tribunals, the House and the Senate, to be invested with the great legislative functions of the Constitution, and when they further provided that a majority vote could pass all bills unless in the instance of a veto by the President, they yielded up the taxing power into the hands of a mere majority not of States but of individual representatives in these two bodies. But, thinking that the division of the bodies into two legislative tribunals might after all be not quite a sufficient restraint upon the power of taxation, they then resorted to this provision: that "for the common defense and the general welfare" Congress might pass laws enforcing taxation. This is a restraint upon the power of taxation. That is the way it happened to be put into the Constitution, not as the grant of a substantive power of legislation, but a restraint upon the power of Congress in respect of taxation. These facts of history will not be disputed. Being undisputed, they control the question of the interpretation of the words "general welfare" found in the Constitution.

Mr. President, is there any power named in the Constitution of the United States, whether it is granted to or reserved by a State, or whether it is granted to the Federal Government, to the President, to the judiciary, or to the National Legislature, that is not for the general welfare? Did the convention put into the Constitution any deed of power to be exercised by any person whatever except for the general welfare? They put in nothing for local welfare, however, as the Senator from Kentucky who sits behind me [Mr. WILLIAMS] remarked. All was for the general welfare. Now, what were those powers? Every power enumerated as mentioned in the Constitution, it makes no difference whether it was given to one body or another, is a power for the general welfare, and only for the general welfare.

Was it intended by the use of the term "general welfare" to put into the hands of Congress some vague and indefinite power outside of and above and beyond all that great scheme of government which is portrayed and fully planned and definitely settled in the body of that instrument? Did anybody believe that the States of the American Union in the formation of that Constitution, after they had formed the entire plan with the utmost care and consideration and had expressed all that they understood in respect of the general welfare, still left, as has been said, some "vagrant power" conferred upon Congress, to be determined by themselves as to its efficiency, its boundaries, its strength, and the time and method of its application; or did they mean when they ordained the Constitution that that instrument itself expressed what was their full, complete, and perfect idea of the general welfare?

I take it that when we want to understand what the general welfare is, in the sense of the Constitution of the United States, we must go to that system of government, we must examine all the powers that are incorporated in that instrument, whether they are given to one person or political body or another, and there we shall find what is meant by general welfare. It means that part of the welfare of the country which has been intrusted by the people in the ordination of this great Government into the hands of the three great departments of the Government—the legislative, the executive, and the judicial. It is not Congress alone that has to deal with the general welfare. There is not an appointment sent in here by his excellency the President that does not relate to the general welfare. There is not a treaty that is ratified by the Senate, after having been made by the Executive, that does not relate to the general welfare. No judge pronounces a decision on the bench that does not relate in some sense to the general welfare. The power to act for the general welfare is by no means confined to Congress.

Let me call the attention of the Senate to some of the distributions of the power to control the general welfare that are made by the Constitution:

Each State shall have at least one Representative.

* * * * * * *

When vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.

There is a portion of the general welfare intrusted to the States of this Union and to their governors:

And if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

* * * * * * *

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

What a very important portion of the general welfare is intrusted to the States themselves by that article of the Constitution!

No State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws; and the net produce of all duties and imposts, laid by any State on imports or exports, shall be for the use of the Treasury of the United States; and all such laws shall be subject to the revision and control of the Congress.

Here are the State and Congress acting in concert for the general welfare.

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress.

And that is for the general welfare.

The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.

And that is for the general welfare.

A person charged in any State with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice, and be found in another State, shall, on demand of the executive authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the State having jurisdiction of the crime.

* * * * * * *

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive (when the Legislature can not be convened), against domestic violence.

* * * * * * *

And the members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound, by oath or affirmation, to support this Constitution.

* * * * * * *

A well regulated militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed.

* * * * * * *

In choosing the President, the vote shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice.

And then it prescribes the places of meeting, &c., and Representatives in Congress shall be chosen every two years by the people of the States.

These are all matters relating to the general welfare as presented in the Constitution of the United States; and I wish to ask all Senators who think that the "blanket clause" in the Constitution enables them to appropriate money or to tax the people for the general welfare if they believe that they can tax the people of the United States for the execution of these parts of the general welfare which are intrusted by the Constitution to the State Legislatures and their executives.

Mr. MAXEY. While the Senator from Alabama was speaking there occurred to my mind a very important letter on the direct point from Mr. Madison to Mr. Edmund Pendleton, then governor of Virginia, dated the 21st of January, 1792.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator do me the kindness to send it to the desk and have it read?

Mr. MAXEY. I think it has not been read in this debate, and I should like to have it read. I ask the Secretary to read the marked passage. I have given the date.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

I have reserved for you a copy of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on manufactures, for which I hoped to have found before this a private conveyance, it being rather bulky for the mail. Having not yet succeeded in hitting on an opportunity, I send you a part of it in a newspaper, which broaches a new constitutional doctrine of vast consequence, and demanding the serious attention of the public. I consider it myself as subverting the fundamental and characteristic principle of the Government, as contrary to the true and fair as well as the received construction, and as bidding defiance to the sense in which the Constitution is known to have been proposed, advocated, and adopted. If Congress can do whatever in their discretion can be done by money, and will promote the general welfare, the Government is no longer a limited one, possessing enumerated powers, but an indefinite one, subject to particular exceptions. It is to be remarked that the phrase out of which this doctrine is elaborated is copied from the old Articles of Confederation, where it was always understood as nothing more than a general caption to the specified powers, and it is a fact that it was preferred in the new instrument for that very reason, as less liable than any other to misconstruction.

Mr. MORGAN. Among the authorities on the construction of the Constitution of the United States I have never found any that I thought were more reliable and more satisfactory than the writings and speeches of Mr. Madison, for he had unquestionably more to do with the framing of that instrument, the adjustment of its language and of its parts, than almost any other American citizen. Mr. Jefferson's expositions of the Constitution were not those of a person who was in the convention and participated in its debates, and who therefore had the opportunity to see the bearing of every part toward every other part. Mr. Jefferson was also radical in his views in respect of human liberty. The old Constitution as it was ordained did not contain a full expression of his views, and he may be more truly said to be the father of the amendments containing the American bill of rights than he was the father of any other portion of this great system of government. I therefore, in accepting a guide among contemporaneous interpreters of the Constitution, rely with more confidence upon Mr. Madison's opinions than I do upon those of any other man. What he has said in the letter which has just been read is a mere summarizing of the whole subject. I will present to the attention of the Senate after a while an argument made by Mr. Madison in Congress upon the cod-fisheries bill.

Mr. MAXEY. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, I wish to call his attention to the date of that letter, January 21, 1792, when the whole matter was fresh in the mind of the members of the constitutional convention.

Mr. MORGAN. And the speech which I propose after a while to read from was in the same year, February 7, 1792, while his mind was drawn to the subject not only by the bill in Congress but by various interpretations which other persons were placing upon this phrase.

I insist, Mr. President, that it was never intended that we should have States with no exclusive powers over subjects relating to the general welfare of the people subject to their jurisdiction, or that Congress at its discretion should have all power over the general welfare of all the people of the United States at large. The Constitution of the United States extends everywhere within the limits of the United States, and its mandatory power and its protecting power and its prohibitory power and its enabling power is found free in all those limits; but the jurisdiction of Congress to enforce its mandates and its protection is far from being as extensive as the Constitution. That is limited, while the Constitution is universal in its bearing.

The power of Congress is limited or prohibited in every one of the instances to which I have just called attention relating to the general welfare. In the matter of choosing a Senator to this body Congress, though it may do some things in respect to that election which are supposed by the Constitution to have reference to the general welfare, can not choose the men who elect any of us as Senators here, or who are to elect those who are to be our successors. Congress can not control the whole subject of election, though it has a limited jurisdiction over it.

But suppose that when the time came for the election of a Senator it should be stated in this body that the State treasury was empty; that there was no money to pay the representatives of the people to assemble at the capital of the State where the election of a Senator was about to occur; that the election of a Senator relates to the general welfare of the country; and that it was therefore necessary that Congress should make an appropriation to pay the expenses of the State Legislature in order that they might elect a Senator.

Suppose the proposition was stated here that the State of Alabama had refused to make any appropriation at all for the purpose of holding an election for members of the House of Representatives. That relates to the general welfare; and while the States have the power to regulate almost everything in respect to such elections, and while Congress has the power to revise their statutes upon that subject, would any Senator arise here and offer a bill that Congress should appropriate money enough to have those elections conducted in Alabama, or would any gentleman put an amendment upon a bill to raise $100,000 by tariff taxation or otherwise for the purpose of conducting Congressional elections in the State of Alabama, and state a pretext for it that the State had omitted or refused to make such an appropriation?

There, sir, is a matter relating to the general welfare; but it is a subject to which the power of the State extends, and not the power of Congress, and in that instance, as in very many others in the Constitution, the powers of Congress in respect of the general welfare are by no means as extensive as the powers of the Constitution of the United States or of the States. No, sir; we stop far short of it. The fathers when they intrusted powers to this body put fetters and limitations on our powers, and they designated in the enumeration of our powers the subjects in respect to which we might control or provide for the general welfare.

The very first clause in the Constitution of the United States limits the jurisdiction of Congress. The very first pen that was put to paper for the purpose of describing the powers of the Federal Government wrote a stern limitation upon the powers of Congress: "All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States;" not universal legislative power, not power commensurate with the idea of Congress, whatever that might be, of the general welfare, but the legislative power "herein granted" is confided to and vested exclusively in Congress. As Senators supporting this bill would read, necessarily, this part of the Constitution it would be "all legislative powers herein granted" and all else that may comport with the general welfare according to the honest opinion of Congress are vested in Congress.

We find, then, not only this restriction upon the extent of the general-welfare clause, but we find various other restrictions in the body of the Constitution, even down into the amendments. Fearing that they had not sufficiently guarded against the usurpation by Congress of powers which the people never thought of intrusting to it, and especially when those powers came in conflict with those to be exercised by the States, our fathers immediately after they adopted the original Constitution placed still further limitations and restrictions upon the powers of Congress. These are found in the amendments to the Constitution.

Mr. President, when I was elected a Senator from Alabama it never occurred to me or to any member of the legislature who did me the honor to vote for me or to the people of that State, or, I suppose, to anybody, that one part of my mission here was to raise school funds to educate the people of my State, no more than that I was to come here and get supplies for the insane hospital, for the institution for the deaf, dumb, and blind, or for the poor-houses of the respective counties, or for the improvement of the common roads of the country, or any other subject that might relate to the general welfare of my people. We have got a constitution in my State and a Legislature elected under it, and in that Legislature may be found men of equal ability with any who are here or have been here from my State upon the floor of either of these Houses. Limited powers are prescribed to them in the constitution, but ample power is given on the subject of public education; plenary power is given to them almost on that subject. Encouragement is expressed in the constitution itself for this great purpose, and those legislators are designated as persons who by law must measure out the proper quantum of relief and assistance to public schools there. It never occurred to me that I had come here for the purpose of raising funds by begging or by legislating for the purpose of building up schools in my State. I have not come here as a mendicant apostle of a propaganda in Alabama that requires money to be begged out of gentlemen of the North to sustain and support us in those industries and enterprises and duties which we ought to perform for ourselves.

Sir, I have the honor to be the father of a family, an honor that I prize as much as anything that I have enjoyed in this world, and I could not receive a greater insult than for a man to come to me and say to me, "I desire to clothe your children for you; I desire to furnish them food; I desire to furnish them a common-school education; I want them to be well raised in point of physical energy and power; I want them to be decent in appearance; I want them to be people who can associate respectably in common society; and, therefore, I propose to relieve you of the burdens which the God of nature and the affections of your heart have devolved on you, burdens which are so dear to you, which so stimulate your manhood, which so build you up in all your efforts to try to earn a living and a respectable standing for yourself and for them—I want to take these out of your hands; you are hardly competent for these duties, anyway, and you can enjoy yourself so much better in the lassitude and ease and indulgence that you can afford to take if I am just permitted to take off these natural burdens which the God of nature put upon your shoulders; and I will do it by an act of Congress, and somebody else will pay all the expenses."

That would offend me, Mr. President, and if he rightly understood it, it would offend the blackest man who works in the cotton-fields of my State; for if you have the power to tax that man and his neighbor to educate his child—and perhaps you have, and I know you have under the State constitution—he, if he understands it, when he finds that you are going not only to educate his child, but to make the education compulsory, will say: "Sir, I would rather do without your money, and have the control of my child."

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAIR. Is it any more disgraceful to that negro that this duty, if undone by any other power, should be performed by the National Government than by the State government? Do not each equally take from him that paternal duty which he fails to discharge?

Mr. MORGAN. That is very true, Mr. President; the argument is a good one, so far as the disgrace to the man is concerned. At the same time, to any man who has the ability to educate himself or his children, it is by no means a compliment for a State legislature or for a national legislature to come and take the job off his hands. It is no compliment to him, and it is scarcely fair to him that it should be done, especially if you go to the other step, which you have the perfect right to go, after having taken the first one, and that is to compel him to send his child to school, and to your school.

Now I insist, Mr. President, that the entire Constitution, and all that belongs to the Government it ordains, is the true definition of the general welfare it was intended to promote. It can not be narrowed so as to exclude from the definition anything that belongs to the Government of the United States, nor can it be stretched so as to include in such definition any power not therein granted expressly or by necessary implication to the Government by the people who ordained it. They ordained it under this restriction: "The powers not delegated to the United States, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

But Congress is very far from having in charge all this broad field of "the general welfare." It can promote and provide for the general welfare as far as its powers extend, but there it must stop. So much of the general welfare as is confided to the care of Congress it can promote and provide for, but so much of the general welfare as is confided to the States Congress can not promote or provide for, either by laws designed to control the same or by appropriations to provide for the expense of promoting the same. It has the power to raise revenue in several ways and to appropriate the same for any matter relating to the general welfare which the Constitution, either expressly or by necessary intendment, places within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government. But Congress can no more enlarge than it can contract the powers of that Government by its own mere declaration. That would make a new constitution every time that Congress might conclude to make a new declaration of its powers.

Now, let us look at another phase of this question in the light of history.

When the Constitution was formed, the States that I will proceed to name had certain constitutional rights which they certainly never gave up, and in reference to the delegation of which, by the States to the United States, there is not the remotest hint in the Constitution.

Sir, you may search with all the anxiety possible, and you will find no word in the Constitution that relates to public charity, to public benevolence, to public education, to insane asylums or deaf and dumb institutions, or to public roads, except post-roads—no hint of it. If it had been the intention of our fathers, who then had written constitutions in their respective States, to have placed within the jurisdiction of Congress power to touch questions of this kind, either by the appropriation of money or by the taxation of the people or by legislative expedients, would there not have been some man found who in the convention would at least have made such a suggestion?

Sir, there was not a man who ever arose on the floor of that convention and hinted at the idea that the subject of public education was one of the subjects that they intended or expected to intrust to Congress; and in the absence of all expression on this subject, and while the State governments had made in their constitutions express and ample provision for the exercise of these particular powers by those State governments, are we to infer that our fathers were so blind and so indifferent in respect to the powers to be conferred upon this new and limited Government as that they should never refer to it by a word in the Constitution to indicate the thought or by the expression of a single suggestion in the convention which framed the Constitution that the general welfare for which Congress was to provide by taxation included the support of common schools in the States?

Now let me call attention to some of the constitutional features that then existed in the different States, and I do it with a view of suggesting the inquiry whether these States intended to give up to the Congress of the United States the powers that they in their constitutions at that time had expressly charged upon the State governments and expressly reserved to them. Here is Delaware, in her constitution of 1792:

SEC. 12. The Legislature shall, as soon as conveniently may be, provide by law for ascertaining what statutes and parts of statutes shall continue to be in force within this State; for reducing them, and all acts of the general assembly, into such order, and publishing them in such manner, that thereby the knowledge of them may be generally diffused; for choosing inspectors and judges of election, and regulating the same, in such manner as shall most effectually guard the rights of the citizens entitled to vote; for better securing personal liberty, and easily and speedily redressing all wrongful restraints thereof; for more certainly obtaining returns of impartial juries, for dividing lands and tenements in sales by sheriffs, where they will bear a division, into as many parcels as may be, without spoiling the whole, and for advertising and making the sales, in such manner and at such times and places as may render them most beneficial to all persons concerned; and for establishing schools, and promoting arts and sciences.

Now I will turn to the State of Georgia. In 1777 Georgia had this provision in her constitution:

ART. 54. Schools shall be erected in each county and supported at the general expense of the State, as the Legislature shall hereafter point out.

Some Senators I suppose will think that under the "blanket clause" that was a mistake of Georgia, for although she put it in her constitution that schools should be established and supported by the State, the real intent was that they should be supported by the Federal Government under the general-welfare clause. Did Georgia ever mean to give up that power to the Federal Government, either directly or by implication? Did she in authorizing the Congress of the United States to legislate for the general-welfare, if you wish to have it in that way, yield to Congress the power to establish schools in her State or to tax her people for their support? Never did she do that. Georgia held on to this rightful reservation of power, and in 1798 it was repeated. In her constitution of 1798 it is said:

SEC. 13. The arts and sciences shall be promoted in one or more seminaries of learning; and the Legislature shall, as soon as conveniently may be, give such further donations and privileges to those already established as may be necessary to secure the objects of their institution; and it shall be the duty of the General Assembly, at their next session, to provide effectual measures for the improvement and permanent security of the funds and endowments of such institutions.

Now, turn to Maine in 1820. I refer to Maine because she was a part of the original territory of Massachusetts, and down to the time of her separation the constitution of Massachusetts applied to her. In the Maine constitution of 1820 it is provided:

ARTICLE VIII.

LITERATURE.

A general diffusion of the advantages of education being essential to the preservation of the rights and liberties of the people, to promote this important object the legislatures are authorized, and it shall be their duty, to require the several towns to make suitable provision, at their own expense, for the support and maintenance of public schools; and it shall further be their duty to encourage and suitably endow from time to time, as the circumstances of the people may authorize, all academies, colleges, and seminaries of learning within the State.

Massachusetts says, in her constitution of 1780:

ART. 3. As the happiness of a people and the good order and preservation of civil government essentially depend upon piety, religion, and morality, and as these can not be generally diffused through a community but by the institutions of the public worship of God and of public instructions in piety, religion, and morality: Therefore, to promote their happiness and to secure the good order and preservation of their government, the people of this Commonwealth have a right to invest their Legislature with power to authorize and require, and the Legislature shall, from time to time, authorize and require, the several towns, parishes, precincts, and other bodies politic or religious societies to make suitable provision, at their own expense, for the institution of the public worship of God, and for the support and maintenance of public Protestant teachers of piety, religion, and morality in all cases where such provision shall not be made voluntarily.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Alabama to yield to me that I may move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. MORGAN. I yield.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask the Senator from Iowa to withdraw that motion for a moment while I give notice of an amendment which I propose to offer to the pending bill. I ask the Secretary to read it so that it may be printed.

Mr. ALLISON. I withdraw the motion for that purpose.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed amendment of Mr. BUTLER; which was to add to the bill as a new section:

The money to be provided for in this bill shall be raised by a direct tax, to be levied annually upon each of the States of the United States, which shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed.

Mr. ALLISON. I renew my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 4, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

REPAIRS TO THE EXECUTIVE MANSION CONSERVATORY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, inclosing a communication from Col. A. F. Rockwell asking for an appropriation for repairs to the conservatory of the Executive Mansion; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LIGHTING THE EXECUTIVE MANSION, ETC.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from Col. A. F. Rockwell, United States Army, asking for an appropriation of $4,000 to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for lighting the Executive Mansion and public grounds, and for repair and care of the Executive Mansion for the present fiscal year; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

HEIRS OF FRANCISCO GARCIA.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a tracing of plat of survey of private land claim of heirs of Francisco Garcia, New Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

KANSAS RAILROAD GRANTS.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill (H. R. 6416) to provide for an adjustment of land grants made by Congress to aid in the construction of railroads within the State of Kansas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. CANDLER, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence on account of sickness in his family.

EX-PRISONERS OF WAR.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from a number of soldiers in my district, asking for the passage of a bill for the relief of ex-prisoners of war. I hope there will be no objection to allowing it to be printed in the RECORD without the names.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. There will be no objection if a like permission be granted to my friend from Iowa [Mr. WELLER], who has been seeking even since Congress began for a like privilege.

Mr. WELLER. I thank the gentleman from Indiana for his suggestion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HUTCHINS. With the understanding that the names in both cases are not to be printed.

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. CONNOLLY then presented the following petition; which was ordered to be printed in the RECORD without the names:

SCRANTON, PA., March 4, 1884.

Hon. D. W. CONNOLLY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

DEAR SIR: We would respectfully ask your support of the pension bill now before Congress, known as Senate bill No. 44 and H. R. bill No. 1189.

In no class of soldiers of the late war is there such a large percentage of disabled persons as among the ex-prisoners. In the majority of cases they are permanently disabled from work or bear in their bodies the seeds of incurable disease. The number now living is comparatively small, as the diseases contracted in confederate prisons and the severity of the treatment there tended to shorten the lives of all who were prisoners for any length of time. As a rule they were attacked with scurvy in the course of a month or two after being subjected to the prison ration, and this disease opened the way for all other diseases. Lack of medicines made it impossible to treat these diseases, and they became firmly fixed in the systems of the sufferers, and the great majority have never recovered. The longer the captivity of a prisoner the less the probability of ultimate recovery; hence the graduating of the pension to the length of captivity. Being separated in many cases from their friends, companions, and regiments, and the lapse of years having obliterated remembrance of names and residence of fellow-prisoners, they are unable to furnish evidence required to procure pensions, as is the case with other applicants.

We trust you will give this bill your earnest support, and in doing so contribute to the relief of a class of old soldiers who are, as the laws at present exist, almost totally debarred from any governmental relief.

SURVIVING SOLDIERS AND SAILORS OF THE LATE WAR.

Mr. WELLER, by unanimous consent, presented the following petitions; which were ordered to be printed in the RECORD without the names:

Preamble and resolutions.

Whereas twenty years have now passed since the "Boys in Blue," by their valor on sea and land on many a hard-fought field, by their patient endurance under the irksome restraints of military life, by their sacrifices for and devotion to the cause of national unity, rendered possible the final triumph and success of the Union arms; and

Whereas many of the surviving soldiers and sailors of the war of the rebellion are now aged; many are almost physically incapacitated for laboring for the means of support for themselves and families, and at the same time, under the present laws, and for lack of sufficient evidence, are utterly unable to secure pensions, while all (or nearly all) are suffering more or less from the hardships and exposures incident to military life; and

Whereas the wounded, maimed, and partially disabled of our comrades having been at least in a measure provided for under existing laws, we feel that the time has now come when all should be recognized and receive some consideration: Therefore,

Be it resolved by J. V. Carpenter Post, No. 104, Department of Iowa, Grand Army of the Republic, That it is declared the sense of this post that all pensions of a lower grade than $8 per month should be abolished, and that all the surviving ex-Union soldiers, sailors, and marines of the late war, holding honorable discharges or certificates of the same, should receive a uniform pension of $8 per month during the remainder of their lives.

Resolved, That we respectfully ask of our Senators and Representatives in Congress that they use all honorable means to secure such legislation at this session of Congress as will accomplish this end.

The above preamble and resolutions were submitted to the post at its regular meeting, on Saturday, January 12, 1884, and unanimously adopted by a rising vote, with request that the same be forwarded to Hon. L. H. WELLER, member of Congress from this district.

H. B. CARPENTER,
Commander Post 104, Department of Iowa, Grand Army of the Republic.

Attest.
A. J. WARNER, Adjutant Post.

---

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, ex-soldiers and sailors of the late war, and their friends do most respectfully and earnestly petition your honorable bodies to enact the following laws:

First. To appreciate our pay to gold value at the time it was due, together with annual interest until paid.

Second. To equalize the bounties.

Believing that these measures are eminently just and, in accordance with promises, a very important part of the obligations which this great nation owes to its defenders, who, through untold hardships, dangers, and death upheld her flag in the dark and trying hours of the rebellion, restoring her unity and all inherent interests secured thereby, enabling her people to resume with grander prospects the pursuits of happiness and prosperity unknown to any other nation, and hoping that the representatives of this Government will concur in the justice and equity of the above measures, your petitioners will ever pray.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Friday the regular order under the rules of the House is the morning hour for the call of committees for reports of a private nature.

Mr. ELLIS. In order that the House may proceed with the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill, which is now nearly finished in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, I move that the morning hour to-day be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. That motion requires a two-thirds vote.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 70, noes 1.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the morning hour has been dispensed with.

Mr. MCMILLIN. This is private-bill day, Mr. Speaker, but the gentleman from Louisiana in charge of the Indian appropriation bill tells me the portions of that bill which still remain to be considered are merely formal, and he does not think they will occupy more than an hour of the time of the House. Therefore I will not insist upon proceeding to the consideration of the business on the Private Calendar for the present, and will withhold the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar until after the appropriation bill has been disposed of.

Mr. STEELE. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar at once.

The SPEAKER. That is a privileged motion.

Mr. ELLIS. I move, for the present, that the consideration of the private business be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar has precedence, this being Friday.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But I thought that motion was withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. No, the gentleman from Tennessee said that he would withhold the motion for the present, but the gentleman from Indiana has insisted on making the motion at once.

Mr. STEELE. I will withdraw my motion and let the question be taken on the motion to dispense with the consideration of the private business.

Mr. KEIFER. It is not necessary, Mr. Speaker, to dispense with the consideration of the private business for to-day, but the House may go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and after the Indian appropriation bill has been disposed of we can then go on with the private business.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I so understood; and in that view, after the morning hour for the reception of reports from committees of a private nature was dispensed with by a two-thirds vote, I consented to withhold for the present the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar for an hour, in which time I have been assured by several gentlemen the Indian appropriation bill will be disposed of.

Mr. STEELE. If the Indian appropriation bill can be disposed of in an hour, and that is the understanding, I will not object.

Mr. REED. Let the motion be made in that way, that we go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for one hour to proceed with the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope not.

Mr. ELLIS. I am willing to agree to that proposition, for the reason that I think in an hour the Indian appropriation bill can be disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Louisiana agrees to the suggestion of the gentleman from Maine, with the condition that if at the end of an hour the House should be engaged in a roll-call it shall be continued until completed.

Mr. STEELE. I am willing to agree to that.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think it ought to be done, and I hope my colleague will allow this important bill to be taken up this morning and completed, even if it takes more than an hour.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It may take an hour and five minutes.

Mr. ELLIS. I do not think it will take more than forty minutes. I move that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. WELLBORN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Indian appropriation bill, and the Clerk will report the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 1130 insert the following:

"For construction of bridges on the Santee-Sioux Indian reservation in Nebraska and the Ponca Indian reservation in the Territory of Dakota, $12,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be immediately available."

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall have to reserve the point of order on this item.

Mr. VALENTINE. I think the point of order comes too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment had not been submitted to the House until this moment, and the Chair thinks the point of order is made in time.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman will withhold the amendment for the present, with a view of submitting it if necessary at a different part of the bill, I think it will be better.

Mr. VALENTINE. I thought that this was the proper point; but if the gentleman makes the point of order on that ground, I will withdraw it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not on that ground. This is a proper enough place if the amendment is in order. I am reluctant to raise the question of order here, but as now advised, after consultation with the members of the Committee on Appropriations, it is thought for the present best that the point of order should be raised. I now make the point of order that this is not authorized by any existing law.

Mr. VALENTINE. I do not know of any particular law which authorizes it, but it is in the line of expenditures made by Congress, and in the two preceding lines of this bill you will find an appropriation of $50,000 made for irrigating-ditches on these reservations. It is a class of expenditures that Congress is constantly making.

Mr. HOLMAN. Without acting upon this amendment at all, I suggest that by unanimous consent, with the point of order pending, it be passed over for the present.

Mr. VALENTINE. I have no objection to withdrawing it with the privilege of recurring to this part of the bill after the remainder of it shall be concluded.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTEREST ON TRUST-FUND STOCKS.

SEC. 2. For payment of interest on certain abstracted and non-paying State stocks belonging to the various Indian tribes, and held in trust by the Secretary of the Interior, for the year ending June 30, 1884, namely:

For trust-fund interest due Cherokee national fund, $26,060.

Mr. PEEL, of Arkansas. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after line 7 of section 2, "$2,000 to be paid George H. Pettigrew for depredation to his property at Vinita, Ind. T., by Cherokees, the same being the amount allowed said Pettigrew by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and recommended by the Secretary of the Interior and the Committee of this House on Indian Affairs to be paid out of the Cherokee Indian fund."

Mr. ELLIS. I reserve the point of order upon that amendment, making it, of course, under clause 4 of Rule XII, that a bill is now pending before a committee of a similar tenor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no difficulty in sustaining the point of order if insisted upon.

Mr. PEEL, of Arkansas. I am aware that the point of order, if insisted upon, will be sustained. But the difference between this amendment and the one offered by the gentleman from California, on which the point of order was made yesterday, is that this has been reported by the committee——

Mr. KEIFER. Is the point of order insisted upon?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands it is.

Mr. PEEL, of Arkansas. This claim, I will say, has been not only adjudicated by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, but its payment has been recommended by the Secretary of the Interior as well as by the Committee on Indian Affairs of this House. And, as I have said, the difference in favor of this amendment is that this has been before the Committee on Indian Affairs and reported back favorably to the House, and is now pending before the Committee on Appropriations. I can see no real reason, therefore, why the point of order should be made upon it, or why it should not go into this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is raised by the gentleman from Lousiana against the amendment just read. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That any disbursing or other officer of the United States, or other person, who shall knowingly present, or cause to be presented, any voucher, account, or claim to any officer of the United States for approval or payment, or for the purpose of securing a credit in any account with the United States, relating to any matter pertaining to the Indian service, which shall contain any material misrepresentation of fact in regard to the amount due or paid, the name or character of the article furnished or received, or of the service rendered, or to the date of purchase, delivery, or performance of service, or in any other particular, shall not be entitled to payment or credit for any part of said voucher, account, or claim; and if any such credit shall be given or received, or payment made, the United States may recharge the same to the officer or person receiving the credit or payment, and recover the amount from either or from both, in the same manner as other debts due the United States are collected: Provided, That where an account contains more than one voucher the foregoing shall apply only to such vouchers as contain the misrepresentation: And provided further, That the officers and persons by and between whom the business is transacted shall be presumed to know the facts in relation to the matter set forth in the voucher, account, or claim: And provided further, That the foregoing shall be in addition to the penalties now prescribed by law, and in no way to affect proceedings under existing law for like offenses. That where practicable this section shall be printed on the blank forms of vouchers provided for general use.

Mr. ELLIS. My attention has been called to the second proviso of that section, in these words:

And provided further, That the officers and persons by and between whom the business is transacted shall be presumed to know the facts in relation to the matter set forth in the voucher, account, or claim.

I did not notice the language particularly of that section, it having been copied from the law of last year, but it occurs to me that that presumption of guilty knowledge is not right. These men are subject to trial; mistakes may occur; and I do not believe the presumption of guilty knowledge should be drawn from the mere fact that the officers made the transaction. I think that ought to be made clear in the course of the proceedings, and I therefore move to strike out the second proviso.

Mr. KEIFER. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Louisiana whether that is not the present law?

Mr. ELLIS. It is.

Mr. KEIFER. Then why strike it out?

Mr. ELLIS. Because I believe it to be wrong. I believe it to be wrong for the reason that intent is the soul of every crime, and guilty intent is a crime. Now, under this proviso the very fact that the transaction occurred between certain parties is on the face of it a presumption of guilty knowledge. I do not think it ought to remain in the statutes.

Mr. KEIFER. I think the gentleman gives more force to this clause of the bill than it is entitled to have. This is a mere presumption which may arise; but it does not in any sense involve a guilty knowledge. It is very usual in criminal statutes. Where an officer is charged with the proper custody of a fund it is provided that he shall be presumed to know that he pays it out properly and in accordance with the law. That is not conclusive, however, of the fact that he has guilty knowledge of any erroneous transaction. That would be a matter for proof. He may show that he is not guilty. There are many such statutes relating to treasurers of States or counties. In my own State, where money is paid out the officer is bound to know that he pays it out in accordance with law; but it is only a presumption at last, which may be rebutted by proof.

I do not think this clause of the bill is subject to the construction which has been suggested by the gentleman from Louisiana.

It is a very wise and proper provision in a law that the person who has charge of funds shall be presumed to know beforehand that he is paying them out properly, and if he is making a mistake, while the presumption may be against him, it is not conclusive against him. I would be opposed to this proviso myself if it were intended to establish a conclusive presumption against him which could not be rebutted in case of a trial. But it is a very proper thing to provide that an officer whose duty it is to pay out a fund should be presumed to know he pays it out properly.

Mr. HOLMAN. I regret the motion to strike out this proviso has been made by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS], for I scarcely think the proviso is subject to the interpretation the gentleman places upon it. In the law of my own State it is made the duty of a public officer to know the fact touching a transaction between himself and another public officer. I do not see how you can avoid that. For instance, the two most important officers connected with the administration of the finances of a State are the treasurer and the auditor. Certainly those officers ought to be presumed to know the nature of a transaction between them. The same principle applies to transactions between other officers of the Government where the co-operation of two or more persons is necessary for the adjustment of an account.

I believe this has been the law for some time, and it is not necessary really to incorporate it in this bill. It is the standing law, and I think has been the law for some years.

Mr. ELLIS. It has been the law for some years. I wish to ask my friend from Indiana this question: Suppose a criminal prosecution for embezzlement, for instance, grows out of a transaction between such officers, could the mere fact that the accused party had been a party to the transaction be used against him to convey to him the guilty knowledge and the intent to defraud?

Mr. HOLMAN. Why, sir, if he puts the fund as a public officer within the reach of another public officer, who makes the embezzlement, the fact that he has done so should be charged upon him. But if so important a provision of law as this is to be changed would it not be better to take a little more time for its consideration? This is a very important provision. And even if the words "and between" should be stricken out, the words "the officers and persons by whom the business is transacted" ought certainly be retained, although the other words are the important words, I admit. The clause would then read:

That the officers and persons by whom the business is transacted shall be presumed to know the facts in relation to the matter set forth in the voucher, account, or claim.

Now, this is but a presumption, and why is not that presumption a correct one?

Mr. ELLIS. In the case of a criminal prosecution growing out of a transaction the presumption of the law is that the accused party is innocent till his guilt is proved. But here that presumption is changed and the law presumes him guilty from the very fact that he was a participant in the transaction.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is the law in my friend's own State, I have no doubt. I do not know any State where it is not the law.

Mr. ELLIS. As suggested to me by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COSGROVE], this unquestionably shifts the burden of proof, requiring the officer who may be prosecuted to prove he is innocent.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think you could ever convict any person charged with embezzlement if you struck out this presumption. I suggest to the gentleman from Louisiana whether he could not do this—whether he could not strike out the words "and between" and leave the others—

That the officers and persons by whom the business is transacted shall be presumed to know the facts in relation to the matter set forth in the voucher, account, or claim.

Mr. ELLIS. I have no objection to that if the gentleman will agree to add this: "but in case of a criminal prosecution such knowledge shall not be construed to impute guilty knowledge or intent to defraud."

Mr. HOLMAN. The accused officer would certainly know himself what he had done in regard to a given voucher. The object of this is to prevent the raising of vouchers.

Mr. MAGINNIS. And signing them in blank.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir; and signing them in blank. It was that practice more than anything else that induced the adoption of this provision. Here is an officer charged with the disbursement of a fund. He furnishes either a false voucher or a blank voucher for somebody else to execute. He does this in violation of the law, and the other person fills up the voucher and uses it improperly.

Mr. MAGINNIS. That is one of the ordinary practices.

Mr. HOLMAN. In that case why should the officer who furnishes the voucher not be charged with a knowledge of the fact that the other person was to use it for a fraudulent purpose?

Mr. ELLIS. In a civil suit it ought to be so. But my point is that a criminal prosecution may grow out of these transactions; and this might be construed to change the whole principle of law in regard to the presumption, and shift the burden of proof from the Government affirmatively to the accused.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend from Louisiana knows very well that the more common case contemplated by this proviso is where a person charged with disbursement furnishes a voucher to another in blank, as suggested by the gentleman from Montana, and that other person uses that voucher in such a manner as to perpetrate a fraud on the Government. The criminal act was furnishing the voucher in blank so that it could be used for a fraudulent purpose. Why, then, should the person who furnished it not be charged with guilty intention, because the first act which he has done is a guilty act?

Mr. MAGINNIS. A man may get blank vouchers anywhere; and it seems to me the man who signs the voucher is the one who ought to know what is in it. He says to the other officer: "Get for me a dozen vouchers in blank, and I will fill them up afterward." He does that, and that is where the abuse arises.

Mr. KEIFER. I desire to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole, and especially the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS], to the context in which this clause is found, for the purpose of suggesting that it does not relate to criminal proceedings at all, but applies here simply to the settlement and adjustment of accounts with the proper accounting officers, and it would not at all be in the way of an ordinary prosecution in a criminal trial. It is only for the purpose of raising a presumption against the officer when settling his accounts with the Department. Take the whole section and it will be seen that it has no reference at all to criminal statutes or criminal proceedings. In my opinion it is eminently proper that it should remain in the bill as herein set forth.

Mr. ELLIS. If I can have unanimous consent, I will modify my amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman has the right to do that.

Mr. ELLIS. Then I modify my amendment by withdrawing the motion to strike out, and instead thereof moving to insert after the word "shall," in line 21, the words "in all civil actions;" so that it will read:

That the officers and persons by and between whom the business is transacted shall in all civil actions be presumed to know the facts in relation to the matter set forth in the voucher, account, or claim.

Mr. KEIFER. I have no objection to that; I think that is what it means now.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is not a casual matter on an appropriation bill, but is a provision of law which has received the sanction of successive Congresses, and it relates to some of the most delicate business relations of the Government, relations between agents of the Government not under the eye of the chief officers—contractors and subcontractors. It seems to me that a well-established principle of law should not be changed or modified without very careful consideration. I trust my friend will allow this section to remain for the present.

Mr. ELLIS. Does the gentleman object to the modification of my motion?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] moving his amendment?

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman has a right to modify his amendment or to withdraw it and move another.

Mr. ELLIS. I withdraw my motion to strike out and move, as I have indicated, to insert after the word "shall" the words "in all civil actions."

Mr. HOLMAN. That presumption of course is indulged in regard to civil proceedings.

The amendment of Mr. ELLIS was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 9. That hereafter each Indian agent be required, in his annual report, to submit a census of the Indians at his agency or upon the reservation under his charge, the number of males above 18 years of age, the number of females above 14 years of age, the number of school children between the ages of 6 and 16 years, the number of school-houses at his agency, the number of schools in operation and the attendance at each, and the names of teachers employed and salaries paid such teachers.

Mr. ELLIS. The Committee of the Whole gave unanimous consent to recur to page 47 of the bill for the purpose of considering the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. VALENTINE].

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment on page 47.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 1130 insert:

"For construction of bridges on the Santee-Sioux Indian reservation in Nebraska, and the Ponca Indian reservation in the Territory of Dakota, $12,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be immediately available."

Mr. VALENTINE. If members of the Committee of the Whole will give me their attention for a few moments, I will endeavor to explain this amendment. It refers to two small agencies, one situated in Northern Nebraska and the other in Southern Dakota. The Santee Sioux, referred to in this amendment, is the smallest band of the six nations of the Sioux, the most civilized of those bands.

A few years ago the Santee Sioux band asked to be taken from the great Sioux reservation and allowed to go over into Nebraska, where they might become agriculturists. The President of the United States by an executive order selected from the public domain in Nebraska a small reservation, and this band was placed upon it. Running entirely through the reservation is the Bazile, a stream which for a large portion of the year is impassable.

The other reservation, the Ponca reservation, is located in the forks between the Missouri River and the Niobrara River, both of which are impassable streams for the entire year. They are not bridged, and there are no ferries at that point.

It will be remembered that a few years ago the Poncas were taken by the Government and transported under an Army escort to the Indian Territory. A portion of these Indians have returned to their old reserve and are now living there and are attached to the Santee Sioux reserve, which is twelve miles distant. These Indians can not communicate with the agent nor the agent with them for a great portion of the year by reason of the two streams running between them.

The agent has recommended to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs that an appropriation be made to construct bridges across these two streams. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs has recommended it to the Secretary of the Interior, and on the 1st of February last the Secretary of the Interior sent a special communication to the Committee on Appropriations of this House urging upon Congress to make the small appropriation of $20,000 for this purpose. For some reason or other unknown to me this communication was never laid before the committee and was not considered by the subcommittee or the full Committee on Appropriations in the consideration of the bill now before the committee.

I can not procure the document I have referred to because a member of that committee carried it out of the committee-room for the purpose of looking at it, and, as he told me, for the purpose of preparing a provision to be inserted in this bill. He has that communication somewhere, I do not know where, and he is not now in the city and has not been in the city since this bill came before the Committee on Appropriations for consideration. It is from no fault of mine or of the Committee on Appropriations, so far as I know, that this provision was not inserted in the first draught of the bill. I think, so far as the members of the Committee on Appropriations are concerned, that had the communication been presented to them they would have inserted such a provision in the bill.

It will be noticed that the amount which I name in my amendment is only $12,000, while the amount asked for by the Interior Department is $20,000. From personal knowledge of the location of the streams and from consultations with practical bridge-builders, I undertake to say that two substantial bridges can be erected for the purpose desired at an expense not to exceed $12,000. I have therefore reduced the amount estimated for by $8,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not waiving the point of order, I wish to inquire of my friend from Nebraska [Mr. VALENTINE] whether I understand him correctly that this appropriation is to construct a bridge or bridges to furnish communication between bands or parts of the same tribe of Indians?

Mr. VALENTINE. Yes, sir; on the Santee Sioux reservation it will. The bridge across the Niobrara will place the Poncas in a position to reach the agency. The agent of the Santee Sioux has charge also of the Poncas, who have returned to the old reservation.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, as I understand, the importance of this bridge is to enable a part of the tribe to reach the agency.

Mr. VALENTINE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. The agency from which they get their supplies?

Mr. VALENTINE. Yes, sir. Now, if the gentleman will permit me, I will make a further statement in his time, as my time has expired.

Mr. CHACE. As I understand—I wish to know whether my understanding is correct—the Santee Sioux Indians and the Poncas are both under the same agent.

Mr. VALENTINE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHACE. And it is necessary that this bridge be constructed so that the Indians may be able to communicate with their agency?

Mr. VALENTINE. Yes, sir; that is it exactly; to communicate with their agency and get their supplies.

I wish to state one thing further, which I think it due to the House I should state at this time. A few years ago, when I first came to Congress, there was on the part of the white residents a feeling of hostility toward the Santee Sioux, a feeling so strong that the white people were almost ready to take their shotguns and drive these Indians away from that portion of the country. But since that time a better feeling has grown up; and I have heretofore attempted, and hope during the present Congress to be able, to secure the passage of a law which will allow the Santee Sioux to occupy lands in severalty upon a part of their present reservation in Nebraska. These Indians in Nebraska have now no title to their lands. They belong to the best class of Indians in the West. They are becoming agriculturists.

Now, through this reservation passes the Bazile, a stream which is impassable during a large portion of the year. This reservation is almost in the center of a county, the county seat lying on the north of it and a large settlement on the south. A portion of the people of the county can not reach the county city a large part of the time because the stream is not bridged and they can not get over it.

Mr. HOLMAN. This stream is within the reservation?

Mr. VALENTINE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. How have the people been able to cross the stream heretofore?

Mr. VALENTINE. During a portion of the year they could not get across; they have had to wait until it became passable. I have crossed it by swimming my horses, but I could not carry many supplies in that way.

Mr. HOLMAN. They have no boats, vessels, or anything of that kind?

Mr. VALENTINE. No, sir; none at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. What kind of bridges are these to be, wooden structures?

Mr. VALENTINE. Yes, sir; I understand so.

Mr. CHACE. Of course they must be the cheapest kind. No doubt they will be wooden structures.

Mr. VALENTINE. I have not determined what they shall be; I shall leave that question to the Indian Department.

Mr. HOLMAN. One other question and I am done, I believe. Has it been the practice of the Government heretofore to build bridges within the limits of these reservations?

Mr. VALENTINE. It has. In other reservations lying within my State—the reservations of the Winnebagoes and the Omahas—all the streams running through the reservations are bridged, and well bridged. They have been bridged at the expense of the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. Are any bills pending in Congress to divide up this reservation, to open it up to settlement?

Mr. VALENTINE. No, sir; so far as I know, none at all. I hope, however, before this Congress adjourns, to procure the passage of a bill allowing these Indians—the Poncas and the Santee Sioux—to take land in severalty as rapidly as they may be able to do so.

Mr. HOLMAN. And sell a portion of the land?

Mr. VALENTINE. No, sir; no part of it is to be sold.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, after the explanation of the gentleman I do not feel justified in insisting on the point of order, although I know nothing at all about the merits of this proposition except from the statements made here.

Mr. ELLIS. I will state that the Department of the Interior urges most strongly that this appropriation be made; but the papers came to us after the bill was framed.

Mr. VALENTINE. There certainly can be no objection to it.

The amendment of Mr. VALENTINE was agreed to.

Mr. ELLIS. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with a recommendation that it be passed as amended.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WELLBORN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6092) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, I shall ask for a separate vote on the amendment to the second proviso of section 8.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the amendment indicated.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 21, section 8, after the word "shall" insert the words "in all civil actions;" so it will read as follows:

"SEC. 8. That any disbursing or other officer of the United States, or other person, who shall knowingly present, or cause to be presented, any voucher, account, or claim to any officer of the United States for approval or payment, or for the purpose of securing a credit in any account with the United States, relating to any matter pertaining to the Indian service, which shall contain any material misrepresentation of fact in regard to the amount due or paid, the name or character of the article furnished or received, or of the service rendered, or to the date of purchase, delivery, or performance of service, or in any other particular, shall not be entitled to payment or credit for any part of said voucher, account, or claim; and if any such credit shall be given or received, or payment made, the United States may recharge the same to the officer or person receiving the credit or payment, and recover the amount from either or from both, in the same manner as other debts due the United States are collected: Provided, That where an account contains more than one voucher the foregoing shall apply only to such vouchers as contain the misrepresentation: And provided further, That the officers and persons by and between whom the business is transacted shall in all civil actions be presumed to know the facts in relation to the matter set forth in the voucher, account, or claim: And provided further, That the foregoing shall be in addition to the penalties now prescribed by law, and in no way to affect proceedings under existing law for like offenses. That where practicable this section shall be printed on the blank forms of vouchers provided for general use."

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that the gentleman from Louisiana in charge of this bill go further, so that this proviso shall apply not only to civil actions but to the settlement of accounts. If the gentleman will agree to that amendment in reference to the settlement of accounts it will perhaps make the amendment safer.

Mr. ELLIS. I do not object to that amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and then the amendment as amended was concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the other amendments of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union will be concurred in.

The was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. ELLIS. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. ELLIS. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules the yeas and nays will be taken on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 225, nays 5, not voting 93; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. ELLIS, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names was dispensed with.

Mr. YOUNG. I am paired with Mr. BAYNE, of Pennsylvania, on all political questions; but not regarding this as such, I have voted.

The following pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk:

Mr. LE FEVRE with Mr. MOREY.

Mr. GEDDES with Mr. JAMES.

Mr. COOK with Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. MORGAN with Mr. MORRILL.

Mr. YOUNG with Mr. BAYNE.

Mr. MCADOO with Mr. THOMAS.

Mr. GREEN with Mr. WADSWORTH.

Mr. DUNHAM with Mr. SMITH.

Mr. COBB with Mr. HOLTON.

Mr. FORAN with Mr. PETTIBONE.

Mr. SCALES with Mr. BURLEIGH.

Mr. ERMENTROUT with Mr. BRUMM.

Mr. DAVIDSON with Mr. STRUBLE.

Mr. LAMB with Mr. RICE.

Mr. POST with Mr. EVANS, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. KASSON with Mr. BEACH.

Mr. HERBERT with Mr. OCHILTREE.

Mr. TOWNSHEND with Mr. WASHBURN, until April 8.

Mr. SENEY with Mr. BISBEE, until April 8.

Mr. BENNETT with Mr. JOHN S. WISE, until April 7.

Mr. HURD with Mr. MCKINLEY, until April 8.

Mr. BLACKBURN with Mr. RUSSELL, until April 8.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, with Mr. STEELE, until April 8.

Mr. WORTHINGTON with Mr. BOWEN, until April 15.

Mr. MORSE with Mr. CALKINS, on this vote.

Mr. GARRISON with Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois, for this day.

Mr. BINGHAM with Mr. MONEY, for this day.

Mr. KASSON. I find myself paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. BEACH. I have voted, but I submit to any gentleman on that side of the House if this should be regarded as a question on which the pair should be maintained. If so, I will withdraw the vote.

Mr. ELLIS. This is not a political question.

Mr. COBB. I am paired on political questions; but not regarding this as such, I have voted. I will, however, withdraw the vote if any gentleman on the other side desires me to do so.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. ELLIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THE PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. CRISP. I rise to a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRISP. It appears, Mr. Speaker, by the Private Calendar, that House bill No. 3935 is placed thereon, and has therefore been referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar. That is a public bill; it is a general law, and was doubtless inadvertently referred to the Private Calendar. I move, therefore, that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of that bill, and that it be referred to its proper calendar.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. What is it about?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3935) to relieve certain soldiers of the late war from the charge of desertion.

Mr. MCMILLIN. That is unquestionably a general bill, and should not have been placed on the Private Calendar.

Mr. MATSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MATSON. I wish to ask whether that bill was not introduced into the House by the committee in lieu of one or more private bills.

The SPEAKER. It was; and the Chair will state that owing to that fact this bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar. It was reported by the Committee on War Claims in lieu of quite a number of private bills referred to that committee. The Chair, of course, not knowing the contents of the bill, but only hearing its title read, supposed it contained the names of the same persons referred to in the private bills, and consequently directed its reference to the Private Calendar. It is now stated, however, that it is a general bill, and applies to all soldiers of the late war who were charged with desertion.

Mr. DINGLEY. Let me ask if the House had not entered upon the consideration of that bill on the last private-bill day?

The SPEAKER. It was considered by the Committee of the Whole on last Friday.

Mr. DINGLEY. Then is it not now too late to change the reference?

The SPEAKER. The fact that the committee had entered upon the consideration of the bill does not deprive the House, by a direct vote, of the privilege of making the change.

Mr. DINGLEY. But not upon a point of order?

The SPEAKER. No, it would require a vote of the House.

Mr. BUDD. I rise to a correction of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. There is a matter of privilege already pending before the House. The gentleman from Georgia moves to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the consideration of this bill and refer it to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The Chair thinks if that is done, that it should take its place on the Calendar as of the date it was reported to the House.

Mr. DINGLEY. If it be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, its consideration having been already entered upon, will it not lose its position as unfinished business?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. DINGLEY. Then I hope it will not be done.

Mr. STORM. This bill a week ago to-day was considered in this House and quite extensively discussed. It is the only bill that gives relief to a large class of soldiers in whom many of the members are interested. If it does not remain on this Calendar, many of the bills members are anxious about can not have a hearing.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then let us discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from its consideration, and consider it now in the House as in Committee of the Whole. It ought to go to the House Calendar anyhow. It is evidently improperly referred to the Private Calendar; but I do not think it belongs to the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MCMILLIN. It is a general law, and should be considered on a different calendar. The Friday calendar is for the benefit of private claims, and should be exclusively for that purpose.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. On last Friday this bill came up for consideration. It was considered and discussed for an hour or more, and I think fully discussed. It seems to me it is entirely too late now for the House to determine whether it will or will not discharge any of its committees from the further consideration of a measure that has been so far considered.

The SPEAKER. It is never too late for the House to determine whether it will or will not discharge any of its committees from the further consideration of any measure.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask a division of the question of discharging the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the consideration of this bill and its reference to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no doubt the motion to take from the Calendar a public bill is always in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. RANDALL. But I want to apprise the House that if that action is taken with reference to this bill it should give it the same status that it has now or one that will secure it early consideration.

This bill relates to a matter connected with which there are, I should suppose, more than one hundred private bills. In effect there is hardly a member on this floor from the northern section of the country who has not one or two or more bills seeking to have the record of a discharged soldier corrected.

Mr. STEELE. The bill the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has referred to is House bill No. 4083, which has passed the House and is in the Senate. The only difference between this and the other bill is that it provides for men that have enlisted, deserted, and enlisted again.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] is in part correct. The bill he refers to as having passed the House does grant some relief, but it leaves out a large number of soldiers. Unless this bill is passed a large number of soldiers would be left without remedy, such for instance as those who went from one regiment and enlisted in another—who did not actually in fact desert the service, but changed their military authority.

Mr. STEELE. There are half a dozen bills pending in the House like that, but not more than half a dozen.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] was to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill and refer it to the House Calendar.

Mr. CRISP. That is my motion.

Mr. RANDALL. I understand, if the suggestion of the Speaker is adopted as to the date of reference being preserved, it would place the bill at the head of the House Calendar. I would further suggest that it be placed there as unfinished business.

Mr. WELLER. I desire to make a parliamentary——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WELLER. If a vote is had on the motion to take this bill from the Private Calender and put it on the other Calendar and that motion is defeated, will not then this bill be considered to-day in its regular order on the Private Calendar?

The SPEAKER. If the motion is defeated the bill will be considered to-day or at some other time in its order on the Private Calendar, whenever the House shall proceed in Committee of the Whole to the consideration of business on the Private Calendar.

Mr. WELLER. Then I hope the House will vote down the motion of the gentleman from Georgia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] makes the suggestion that the bill be placed on the House Calendar and be considered as unfinished business of that Calendar.

Mr. VANCE. The effect of that will be that you can only reach the bill by going to the consideration of the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. That can be done by a majority vote of the House after the morning hour.

Mr. REAGAN. But it could only be done to-day by a vote of two-thirds.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has submitted that proposition simply as a suggestion or request made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, not as a motion.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw it if the disposition of the House is to vote down the proposition.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I wish to say this: The bill which the Committee on Military Affairs reported to the House, and which has passed the House and gone to the Senate, provides for a very large number of cases of muster-out and correction of record. It excludes a few cases which would be included in the bill about which we are speaking.

But I apprehend that a portion of those cases to which my friend from Pennsylvania alluded as not being provided for in that bill would be justly excluded, because the soldiers in those cases were bounty-jumpers. But there is a portion of those soldiers who were excluded in our bill who probably ought to be included. We think the speediest way to reach that is to reach it in the Senate, and then if the bill comes back to the House act upon the amendment of the Senate favorably here. That will save the time of the House and the necessity of passing another bill, which covers mainly the same ground as the one we have already passed. I have no doubt all that ought to be done and which the House would be willing to have done could be done in that way much more expeditiously than by undertaking to consider this second bill. Therefore I hope the Committee of the Whole House will be discharged from the consideration of it as a private bill, and that it will be put on the Private Calendar.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the pending motion should be rejected, would not a motion be in order to go into Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of considering the Private Calendar, which would bring up the consideration of that bill at once?

The SPEAKER. That motion would be in order.

Mr. CRISP. The motion I made was made in the interest of the orderly conduct of the business of this House. It appears that through inadvertence a public bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar. Even in the limited experience I have had here I see that on private-bill day the House is thin; but few members are present. That is not the case when public legislation, legislation affecting the whole country, is anticipated.

This bill in my judgment should go to the House Calendar; and when placed there the House can reach it whenever they get ready by going to the House Calendar. They can do that by a majority vote. And the suggestion of the Speaker is that it take its place on that Calendar as of the day when it should have gone there. I submit to the House whether, because they favor any particular measure, it is wise or proper to disregard the rules of this House, or to fail to correct what is conceded to be an improper reference, simply that some particular bill or law may be passed. Had we not better observe the rules, and by the rules reach legislation, and not attempt to legislate in spite of or over the rules? I demand the previous question.

Mr. WELLER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question, if he will permit me.

Mr. STEELE. What is the regular order?

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion made by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. STEELE. I call for the regular order.

Mr. WELLER. The question I wish to ask is whether the effect of this motion would not be to defeat the passage of the bill this session?

Mr. MORRISON. It will not defeat anything. It is entirely right.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

Mr. SPRINGER. That motion I believe is divisible?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I ask for a division of it.

The SPEAKER. The vote will then be first taken on that part of the motion which proposes to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill indicated.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 43, noes 64.

Mr. CRISP. Inasmuch as this is a question affecting the observance of the rules of the House, I must ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SPRINGER. There seems to be some confusion resulting from the division of the question. I therefore withdraw the demand for a division of the question, so that the vote can be taken on the entire motion.

The SPEAKER. The demand for a division having been withdrawn, the question now is upon the motion to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill indicated, and to place the same on the House Calendar.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 33, noes 90.

Mr. HAMMOND. No quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CRISP and Mr. DINGLEY were appointed.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Would it not be better to adjourn? We are really doing nothing now.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 52, noes 118.

So the motion to discharge the Committee of the Whole was not agreed to.

Mr. DINGLEY moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CORRECTION OF THE RECORD.

Mr. BUDD. I rise to a correction of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUDD. On yesterday an amendment submitted by me to the Indian appropriation bill was objected to on a point of order raised under subdivision 4 of Rule XXI, that the amendment was the substance of a bill pending before the House, and the Chair very properly sustained the point of order. The RECORD makes it appear that the amendment was objected to under subdivision 3 of Rule XXI, which objection would not have been sustained by the Chair. I ask that the RECORD be corrected so as to show that the point of order was raised under subdivision 4 of Rule XXI.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the correction will be made.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering business on the Private Calendar.

Mr. VALENTINE. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion until I can have an improper reference of a bill changed.

Mr. MCMILLIN. If it will not give rise to any debate.

Mr. VALENTINE. It will not. I send up a resolution to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of the bill of the House No. 6333, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

Mr. VALENTINE. The Pacific Railroad Committee is the proper committee to consider that bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. I am inclined to object to that.

Mr. VALENTINE. I knew you would. Let the bill be read; it is very short.

Mr. McMILLIN. I can not yield further. I must demand the regular order. We have already taken up two hours of the day and done nothing.

Mr. VALENTINE. I think that if the bill is read nobody will object. I am sure the Speaker, when he hears the bill read, will say that the reference to the Committee on Public Lands was improper. It is a bill granting the right of way to a railroad through the Yellowstone National Park.

Mr. BLAND. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a joint resolution of the following title:

A joint resolution (H. Res. 193) to provide for printing certain documents relating to customs revenues and domestic exports for the use of Congress.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McMILLIN. I now insist upon my motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar. The Clerk will report the title of the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3935) to relieve certain soldiers of the late war from the charge of desertion.

Mr. MULDROW. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MULDROW. When the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar rose last Friday it had under consideration House bill No. 1000, for the relief of Myra Clark Gaines. The bill had been read, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COSGROVE] had the floor upon it, and yielded to a motion that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will direct the RECORD to be examined in order to ascertain.

Mr. STEELE. And I hope the Chair will also ascertain how the bill in relation to charges of desertion came to be passed over. I believe it was passed over with the understanding that it should come up for consideration to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW] that the bill to which he refers was not considered on Friday last.

Mr. MULDROW. I have the RECORD here, and ask that the Clerk read the portion I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1000) for the relief of Myra Clark Gaines.

The bill was read, as follows:

* * * * * * *

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe this bill is reported by the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON]. It will undoubtedly give rise to a very prolonged debate, and I suggest to that gentleman that it be passed over informally.

Mr. COSGROVE. The bill was not reported by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I introduced the bill originally, but the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COSGROVE] reported it from the Committee on Private Land Claims, and has charge of it. I have no objection to any arrangement which the Committee of the Whole may make.

Mr. COSGROVE. I certainly do not want to consent and will not consent that this bill should be passed over; it should be disposed of in its order. This question has been before Congress for years, and there have been three or four reports of committees favorable to this claim. Here is another report in favor of the claim, and I think the Committee of the Whole should now proceed to act upon it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust my friend from Missouri will not insist on the committee proceeding with this bill to-day. I am not only opposed to the bill in its main features but I am opposed especially to the issue of land-scrip. I would rather see the Government do anything else than that. I think no policy would be more fatal.

There are several bills which have been laid aside to be reported favorably which should be acted upon by the House, and it has been agreed that the yeas and nays shall be taken on one of them, which will occupy some time. I therefore move that the committee rise.

Mr. McMILLIN. I would suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that before that is done he should allow the report accompanying the bill to be read, in order that it may be printed in the RECORD and examined by those who are to act upon it hereafter.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well; I withdraw the motion until the report is read.

Mr. COSGROVE. Mr. Chairman, I have not yielded the floor; and I do not understand how gentlemen can take me off the floor by the motion that the committee rise.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COSGROVE] has the floor.

Mr. COSGROVE. I have no objection to the report being read, neither have I any objection to the committee now rising, but I do not want this bill to be displaced. I want it to be considered in its order on the Calendar. If gentlemen want the report to be read I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Missouri that if the committee should now rise the pending bill will not be passed over, but will retain its place on the Calendar to be considered when the House shall again go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McMILLIN. I am willing that instead of the report being now read it shall be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HOLMAN. The report is quite a long one, and there is scarcely time enough for its reading now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] asks unanimous consent that the report be printed in the RECORD without being read. Is there objection?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it is entirely too long a report to be printed in the RECORD, and we all have it in our rooms.

Mr. McMILLIN. I withdraw the request as to the printing of the report, and move that the committee rise and report its action to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MULDROW. The RECORD shows that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COSGROVE] had been recognized as entitled to the floor upon the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. When the bill to relieve certain soldiers of the late war from the charge of desertion was reached, I believe it was passed over informally though I do not recollect the exact manner in which it was passed over.

Mr. STORM. I have the RECORD here. I read from the top of the second column on page 2582:

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks that the pending bill be passed over for one week. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

There being no objection, the bill was passed over for one week. Now I make the point——

Mr. HOLMAN. My point of order is that this measure was, in the language of the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, as accepted by the Committee of the Whole, "passed over for one week." The House now at the end of a week goes again into Committee of the Whole. I submit that while the bill to which the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW] has called attention is in fact unfinished business, still a bill which was first reached on the Calendar and which was passed over for one week resumes now its place on the Calendar and takes precedence of the other bill.

Mr. MULDROW. The point I make is that the bill for the relief of Mrs. Gaines is unfinished business, and comes up now just as though the House had not adjourned on last Friday at the precise moment when it did adjourn.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will decide this matter——

Mr. STEELE. I want to call the attention of the Chair to page——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to decide the question. The committee not having entered upon the consideration of the bill to which the gentleman from Mississippi has called attention, that bill can not be considered as unfinished business; it was laid aside to retain its place on the Calendar. But the consideration of the bill "to relieve certain soldiers of the late war from the charge of desertion" was entered upon; that bill was considered, and it is the bill which now comes before the Committee of the Whole.

RELIEF FROM CHARGE OF DESERTION.

The Committee of the Whole House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3935) to relieve certain soldiers of the late war from the charge of desertion.

Mr. LYMAN. I am requested to state that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] is absent from his seat to-day on account of sickness. As the introducer of this bill, he ought perhaps to be here during its consideration. I am requested, therefore, to ask that the bill be laid aside without prejudice, to be taken up on another occasion.

A MEMBER. Let it be laid aside for one week.

Mr. STEELE. Make it two weeks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state, for the information of the committee, that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] has requested the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JONES], who is next in order upon the Committee on War Claims, to represent him in the consideration of this bill.

Mr. LYMAN. Then I withdraw my proposition.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I do not insist that this bill be considered to-day, if by going over it will not lose its place on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that it will not lose its place on the Calendar.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Let it go over till my colleague [Mr. GEDDES] shall be here.

Mr. HOUK. Although the bill may not lose its place by going over, will it stand as the first business for consideration on the next private-bill day?

The CHAIRMAN. It will unless otherwise ordered.

Mr. DINGLEY. I hope we shall proceed with the consideration of the bill to-day.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Objections to laying the bill aside come from every quarter. Therefore I think it best that the consideration of the bill should proceed to-day.

Mr. LYMAN. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JONES] will proceed.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, there has been sent to the Committee on War Claims——

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Before the gentleman begins, I desire to inquire whether there are not certain proposed amendments pending to the bill. If so, I would be glad if they could be stated now, for the information of the Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. There are no amendments pending. The gentleman from Wisconsin will proceed.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I wish to have read, for the information of the Committee of the Whole, a letter from the Secretary of War, which has been received by the Committee on War Claims since last Friday.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, April 3, 1884.

SIR: My attention has been called to the terms of my letter to you of the 14th of January, 1884, in relation to legislation proposed to authorize the removal of the charge of desertion from the record of certain soldiers of the late war, and upon reflection I am satisfied that I should have been more particular in that letter in referring to proper restrictions to be placed upon the Secretary of War in acting upon the cases of men who deserted from their original regiments, and enlisted in other regiments, and served without fault through the latter enlistment. I ask your leave to modify the letter above referred to in this regard.

The cases which have attracted my attention have been those where the time and manner of the desertion and of the new enlistment were such as to indicate, without much doubt, that the desertion was not inspired by a desire to abandon the service, or to secure any personal benefit other than a change of personal relations. Casting out of consideration the small bounty of $100 given by the Government under the act of 1861, the first bounty of consequence offered by the Government was $300, under a general order dated June 25, 1863; but on August 4, 1862, a draft was ordered if any State did not before the 15th of August, 1862, fill up its quota of a call for 300,000 men. The records of this Department do not show when local authorities began to offer bounties for recruits to fill their quotas, nor the character and amount of such bounties; but it is believed that the above date, August 4, 1862, may be taken as a time before which certainly no local bounties were offered, and before which no substantial pecuniary inducements existed for desertion and a re-enlistment in another command. By that time also a general knowledge of military duties had been acquired sufficient to inform any soldier that leaving one regiment and going to another without authority, under any pretext, was a serious military offense for which he should bear all lawful consequences. If, therefore, you will permit me to amend the last clause of my letter so that it will read, "I would, therefore, suggest, for the consideration of the committee, while considering the proposed amendment, the propriety of a further amendment giving the Secretary of War, under such restrictions as may seem proper, the discretionary power to remove the charge of desertion raised against soldiers who subsequently, but prior to August 4, 1862, enlisted, and received an honorable discharge after faithful service in another regiment," my suggestion will not include a condonation of the offense of bounty-jumping, or deserting and re-enlisting to procure a bounty.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ROBERT T. LINCOLN,
Secretary of War.

Hon. GEORGE W. GEDDES,
Chairman Committee on War Claims,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK].

Mr. HOUK. Mr. Chairman, one fact is certain; there are numbers of soldiers who served faithfully in the last war against whom the charge of desertion undeservedly stands on the records. Something must be done, or these men are left with this badge of infamy upon them. Now, it is utterly impossible, as the experience of everybody in legislation and all other human transactions shows, to adopt any general rule which may not be in some cases abused.

And if we pass this law undoubtedly there may be exceptions to the general rule and some unworthy person may take advantage of it. But I apprehend there is not a gentleman on the floor of this House who has investigated this subject, who has looked into it and analyzed the character of the soldiers against whom this charge stands upon the records of the War Department, who will pretend to say that anything like a majority, or indeed any considerable portion of the men to be relieved by the passage of this act, come within the position assigned to them by the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE], who seems to think the entire proposition is for the benefit of bounty-jumpers, and bounty-jumpers alone.

There is another fact to which I shall briefly allude. You gentlemen who were in the service on either side know it to be true that every man against whom the charge of desertion has been entered was not actually or intentionally a deserter from his command. The mark of desertion entered down against any man's record depends in a great measure on a combination of circumstances. If a man was absent from his command without leave, without any intention of deserting, down goes the mark against him upon the records of the War Department. Every man who was absent without leave stands, as I understand it, in the War Department as a deserter unless he had the sagacity to go to work at once and have the matter properly adjusted either by the action of his superior officer or through the medium of a court of inquiry. This is well known to those who are cognizant of the military service. Who that was in the military service does not know that this charge of desertion was entered against soldiers who were absent without leave, but without any intention or purpose of desertion, and who, supposing the matter capable of full and fair explanation, and taking it for granted that such explanation was accepted, as a matter of course neglected to take the necessary steps to have the charge examined and the record corrected. Now, as I understand it, this bill does nothing more or less than invest the Secretary of War with the power to look into all such cases and analyze them for the purpose of ascertaining by the proof whether or not the soldier did or did not have the criminal intent to desert from his command. If the case be one where the soldier was absent innocently, then relief ought to be afforded, and it is in such cases, as I understand it, that this bill does afford the necessary relief.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The gentleman has not carefully considered this measure. It provides that the charge of desertion shall be removed where the soldier deserted one command in the Army and then joined another command from which he received an honorable discharge.

Mr. HOUK. "I thank thee, Jew," for that word. That explains the whole thing; for if the soldier joined another command in the Army and was honorably discharged from the service, it is the strongest evidence which could be presented that he did not intend disgracefully to desert his command, but was loyal to the flag of his country.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. HOUK. I hope the interruption will not be taken out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HOUK. I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin to yield to me for one minute longer.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Certainly.

Mr. HOUK. Another thing in connection with these deserters is this: This charge of desertion, marked down against the soldier upon the records of the War Department, frequently resulted from the bad temper or ill-will of the officer in command, taking advantage of a mere technical desertion, without any intention on the part of the soldier to desert his flag. It depended on the relations between the officer and the soldier whether the soldier was marked down as a deserter or not. Every one acquainted with the military service knows soldiers were wrongfully and improperly entered as deserters by their superior officers through malice.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. How much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. Eighteen minutes.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I will reserve that time until I hear from the other side.

Mr. STEELE. I will take the floor, Mr. Chairman, and yield for ten minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK].

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I approach the discussion of this question with something of the diffidence of my friend from Michigan [Mr. HORR], perhaps more, because I rise to oppose the bill. First, I have felt I could oppose this measure under the leadership of such gentlemen as my friend from Indiana [Mr. STEELE], my friend from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], and my friend from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], all of whom were distinguished and faithful officers of the Union Army, without having questioned either my patriotism or my disposition to do everything which could properly be done by the Government in behalf of men who served loyally in the Union Army.

There are some things to which I wish to call the attention of the House before members are called upon to cast their votes. Unquestionably it is proper certain men should be relieved from the charge of desertion which has been improperly entered against them on the records of the War Department; but I fear the committee in preparing the second section had in view certain aggravated cases, and, intending only to cover such cases, have gone further than is proper for us to go under all the circumstances. In the brief time I have I propose to state the effect the passage of this measure will have upon the public Treasury as an incident to the effect it will have upon the class known as deserters. I doubt not its effect upon the public Treasury will meet the cordial support of my genial friend from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD]. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I have before me letters from the Pension Bureau telling me that the number of claimants under the arrearages act that will be relieved by this bill is 2,500. I am further informed that the amount which will be paid to them as arrearages will be $2,500,000. Now, I ask gentlemen on the committee having charge of this bill if they have thoroughly investigated these 2,500 claims and made up their minds that they wish to relieve even one-fifth of that number, and allow, under the provisions of such a bill as this, $2,500,000 to be taken out of the public Treasury and paid them simply as arrearages without regard to the merit of the party?

Mr. WELLER. As a member of the committee I will say to the gentleman that I would take out $2,500,000 very quickly for the soldiers.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, there is no man who would be more willing to take out or to pay out $2,500,000 for the benefit of certain classes of our soldiers, to those who were meritorious and deserving, than I. But, sir, you want to bear in mind here that there are 2,500 of them covered by this bill, and you want to make up your mind clearly whether or not all of them are entitled to this clemency and gratuity before you are willing to pass such a bill.

Now, this is a bill not simply to allow the stain of desertion to be removed from the military records of these men, but it is a bill to allow a certain class of claimants to collect their arrearages under the pension law and to have pensions paid them for all future time.

But I have some information here from the War Department to which I desire also to call the attention of the committee. We find, Mr. Chairman, that previous to March 17, 1863—bear in mind the dates—previous to March 17, 1863, the desertions from the Army amounted to 91,038. It is impossible to tell from any of the records of the Department what proportion of these men who deserted re-enlisted. You will remember, sir, that it was about August, or perhaps in the fall, of 1862 that local bounties amounting to $1,000 began to be paid by the counties and cities. The bounty varied in certain localities, but that was near the amount that was paid. Now, previous to the March following, 91,000 had deserted.

Mr. ROWELL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Does he say that it was in the fall of 1862 that these bounties were offered, or does he mean the fall of 1863?

Mr. HISCOCK. Usually the large bounties were offered, I think, in the spring of 1863. But the call for 300,000 additional men was made, as the committee will remember, in August, 1862.

Now then, Mr. Chairman, from March 18, 1863, to December 31, 1863, during nine months of that year, the desertions were 38,296. Well, sir, we will take the number of desertions now from January 1, 1864, to December 31, 1864, when the largest bounties were paid, and you will doubtless be startled to learn that in these twelve months the desertions from the Army reached the number of 90,840 men. From January 1, 1865, to December 1 of that year the desertions were 58,420, making in the aggregate of all the desertions during the war a total of 278,000 men. Now the question arises whether the members of this committee should not be a little more careful in the provisions to be adopted here, and look to it critically and see what classes of men the bill actually covers. And I put this question to them, having presented the bill for our consideration: Is it safe to put a provision into this bill which may have so wide a range, simply because it covers one particular man that a gentleman has in his mind who presents a meritorious case and whom he may desire specially to relieve from the stain resting upon his name? That is the question presented.

Mr. Chairman, it is impossible, as I have already intimated, to tell at the War Department the number of men who deserted and re-enlisted. But in the letter which I have before me I will read what is said by the Adjutant-General of the Army with reference to the amount of money that in his judgment will be necessary, from the best information that he is able to obtain, to meet the requirements of this bill in its present form. He says:

As to the probable amount of money involved in the bill (House bill 3935, to relieve certain soldiers from the charge of desertion), I can only state approximately that it is believed it will take from thirty to fifty millions of dollars.

Again I appeal to gentlemen of this committee if it is safe to put a provision in a bill that will cover some particular meritorious case that you have in your mind when it may go further and cover the cases of 200,000 deserters who ought not to be relieved, and at the same time take from the public Treasury of this country anywhere between thirty and fifty millions of dollars? I believe, sir, for it is a matter that does not admit of serious question, that there is a certain class of cases that ought to have relief extended to them; but what I object to is that this provision of the bill has not had the consideration that I believe it ought to have before it is adopted by the House. And I do not believe that such eminent gentlemen as the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, General ROSECRANS, who will always guard the rights of the soldiers, my friend from Indiana, General BROWNE, whose voice is ever heard in advocacy of the soldier, my friend who sits immediately behind me [Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa], who comes here a cripple from the war, and the gallant gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] sitting behind him, I do not believe, sir, that these gentlemen would give misleading information or that their wise advice ought to be disregarded in opposition to the adoption of a loose provision in the bill that will open the door as wide as this does and that takes from the Treasury the sums of money I have mentioned, sums large enough in the aggregate, as I intimated at the outset, to satisfy my friend from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] in his efforts to dispose of the "surplus" in the Treasury.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in this connection I will send to the Clerk's desk to be read the report of the Provost-Marshal-General for the period from March 17, 1863, to March 17, 1866.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. HISCOCK. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will yield to me two minutes longer.

Mr. STEELE. Certainly.

Mr. HISCOCK. This is the report of the Provost-Marshal-General on desertions. I do not care myself to adopt the language he has employed. I desire simply to have his report read. It will be profitable at least to have it considered, and I hope we will have order while it is being read, for it is very important as bearing on this question.

The Clerk read as follows:

DESERTIONS.

It appears beyond dispute that the crime of desertion is especially characteristic of troops from large cities and of the districts which they supply with recruits. The ratio per thousand of desertions to credits throughout the loyal States is 62.51. In the State of New York it rises to 89.06, and in the small States near New York city it is still higher. In New Jersey it is 107; in Connecticut, 117.23; in New Hampshire, 112.22. Yet the general ratio of New England is but 74.24, the ratio of Massachusetts being 66.68; that of Vermont, 51.75; and that of Maine, 43.90. In the West, where large cities are rare, the average ratio sinks to 45.51.

It is probable that a more minute examination of the statistics of the Army than has yet been made would reveal the fact that desertion is a crime of foreign rather than native birth, and that but a small proportion of the men who forsook their colors were Americans. It is a notorious circumstance that the great mass of the professional bounty-jumpers were Europeans. In general the manufacturing States, as, for instance, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, and New Jersey, rank high in the column of desertion; and this result is to be attributed not only to the fact that such States are dotted with towns and cities, but to the secondary fact that these towns and cities are crowded with foreigners. The respectable and industrious part of this population did, indeed, produce a mass of faithful troops; but with these were mixed a vast number of adventurers, unworthy of any country, who had no affection for the Republic, and who only enlisted for money.

In general, those States which gave the highest local bounties are marked by the largest proportion of deserters. The bounty was meant to be an inducement to enlistment; it became, in fact, an inducement to desertion and fraudulent re-enlistment.

It is a singular and at first sight a puzzling fact that two extreme Western States, Kansas and California, are distinguished respectively by the high ratios in desertion 117.54 and 101.86. But it must be remembered that more than half the male population of Kansas entered the service, and that consequently its contingent contained an unusually large percentage of men whose presence was necessary to the subsistence and protection of their families. In further explanation of this fact something may be attributed to a lax state of discipline natural in border regiments serving for the most part in a somewhat irregular defense of their own frontiers. As for California, it is to be observed that a portion of the contingent of that State consisted of men levied in the large cities of the East or of adventurers from all quarters of the globe collected in the cosmopolitan thoroughfares of San Francisco.

Mr. HISCOCK. Now, Mr. Chairman, the history I have had read was written——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] yield further to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir. How much more time does the gentleman from New York want?

Mr. HISCOCK. I suppose I can be recognized in my own right and then I can return to the gentleman from Indiana whatever time I may receive from him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana has twelve minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. STEELE. I yield eight minutes more to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, as I was about to say, the history that has been read was written after the close of the war. And I think, sir, there are gentlemen upon this floor who remember as I do that the last calls were filled in the Northern States too largely by deserters. It was a notorious fact, almost an open secret, that gangs came over from Canada, deserters who had fled and gone there; that they went from one provost-marshal's office to another. And it was understood before all of those troops had been moved to the front that real hostilities were closed. This provision covers all of those men who doubtless went forward. They deserted a dozen times, many of them, and many of them received a dozen bounties of a thousand dollars each. And yet perhaps they went to the front and without any service or without any substantial service in the face of the enemy, they received an honorable discharge. And all this class of men is to be let in.

Mr. Chairman, I will go as far as any man in removing the charge of desertion from the soldier who deserves to have that charge removed. And I believe if I act under the advice and follow the example of the gentlemen whom I have named I shall go as far as I can go consistently with a due regard to the honor of those who did not desert.

There is a class of men, Mr. Chairman, that doubtless should have relief. I have here a communication from the War Department bearing upon that question which I shall ask to have read from the Clerk's desk. I will say, sir, it is believed at the War Department it would be much better to invest some officer with a discretionary power with reference to this question; to give him judicial functions—not to narrowly limit him in the exercise of his discretion, but give him full discretion or judicial power over all cases coming within certain classes.

I send to the desk to have read the classes of soldiers within which it is thought by the War Department relief from the charge of desertion should be extended.

The Clerk read as follows:

First. When charged with desertion, who voluntarily returned within thirty days and served honorably to the end of their term of service.

Second. Men who deserted from hospital or from furlough given from a hospital while suffering from wounds, injuries, or disease received or contracted in the service and line of duty, and who on recovery returned voluntarily to the service and served honorably until discharged or who died from such wounds, injuries, or disease while so absent and before the date of muster-out of their regiments.

Third. Men who returned under the President's proclamation and served honorably until discharged.

Fourth. Men who left the service without proper authority (and thereby became deserters) for the purpose of relieving their families residing within the enemy's lines from distress or want, and who returned voluntarily and served honorably until discharged.

Fifth. Men who, while awaiting exchange, deserted from parol camp, or while on furlough from a parol camp or other authoritative source, and who voluntarily returned and served honorably until discharged.

Sixth. Men who deserted from a furlough given by any authoritative source, and who, during such absence, died from wounds inflicted by the enemy or disease contracted in the service before the muster-out of their commands.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I will vote to give the discretionary power to the Commissioner of Pensions or to the Secretary of the Interior to relieve soldiers coming within those classes from the charge of desertion. But I think I have demonstrated that this second provision has not had that consideration that it ought to have. I think I have demonstrated that it is in the interest of the claim agents rather than in the interest of the honest and faithful soldier. I think I have demonstrated that this Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar is not the proper place to formulate the provisions which should be adopted by the House. And what I desire, sir, is this, that this bill may be recommitted to the committee, that the committee may consult with the Secretary of War and with the Commissioner of Pensions and carefully investigate and determine what classes ought to be relieved, and then bring in a bill here relieving those classes. But I hope no provision will be adopted because this man or that man has in his mind the case of some neighbor perhaps who is suffering great hardships that are covered by the bill—I hope, I say, no provision will be adopted which in covering one such case will give relief to one hundred and fifty professional bounty-jumpers—in that proportion. I am sure that a provision can be formulated that will not be liable to the objection I have made.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] has five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. STEELE. I desire to reserve that.

Mr. HISCOCK. I hope that some time I may be recognized in my own right, and then I will yield some of my time to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE], as I have used up so much of his time.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. As it may change somewhat the current of debate, I wish now to give notice of an amendment which I will offer at the proper time for the purpose of making this bill conform somewhat to the ideas of the Secretary of War. I ask that the amendment be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to section 2 of the bill the following:

"Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not be applicable to any soldier who willfully deserted for the purpose of obtaining a bounty by re-enlistment; and the granting of relief in each case shall be discretionary with the Secretary of War, after an investigation of the facts."

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM].

Mr. WELLER. I desire to know the order of debate on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM] is entitled to the floor for five minutes.

Mr. WELLER. I wish to be recognized, as a member of the committee reporting this bill, when the proper time comes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will decide upon that when the proper time comes. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. STORM. I have paid serious and thoughtful attention to the remarks made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] who has just addressed the committee. I wish myself that the consideration of this bill could have been postponed for one week. I conceive that there may be important and serious consequences hanging upon our action upon this bill which should be very thoughtfully and carefully considered by this committee.

I would say to the gentleman from New York that the Committee on War Claims when it considered this bill did not probably take into consideration all the consequences that would follow upon its passage. For instance, they did not go into the question of how many soldiers might be affected by the provisions of this bill. I do not think that would be a proper method of considering a question of this kind. If these soldiers are entitled to the relief which this bill seeks to afford them, they ought to have it without regard to the consequences to the public Treasury. If they are not entitled to it, then of course there should be no provisions at all made for them. It is hardly a proper way to consider legislation to first consider whether we can afford to pay for that which is right or just to the soldiers. And I will say that we did not consider the question in that aspect.

What have we done, and what is the complaint which is made here? The bill which the Committee on War Claims has reported is precisely the bill that was passed at the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress. It is precisely that bill, word for word, with two exceptions. One change which we have made is to add to the second section these words: "or who subsequently enlisted in another regiment or company."

That is an addition to the act of 1882, which was made at the suggestion of the Secretary of War, who said that provision should be made for that class of soldiers. And the amendment proposed by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JONES], and which has just been read at the Clerk's desk, will if adopted obviate the objection of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] that bounty-jumpers might claim the benefits of this bill if passed in its present shape.

The other change we have made was to omit from the fourth section of the act of 1882 the second proviso, as follows:

That no soldier, nor the heirs or legal representatives of any soldier, who served in the Army a period of less than twelve months, or who intentionally deserted, shall be entitled to the benefits of the provisions of this act.

The Secretary of the Treasury held that that second proviso annulled the act, so that it did not give him any more power than he had before that bill was passed. I presume that the Secretary of War, in construing the section, when the question came up as to whether a soldier intentionally deserted or not, felt himself bound by the record before him that the soldier had deserted, and held that that record was proof conclusive of intentional desertion. The Secretary of War recommended that the second proviso of section 4 of the law of 1882 should be omitted, and we have done so.

Mr. DINGLEY. Was not that second proviso to which the gentleman refers inserted in the bill by the Senate, and was not in the bill as it passed the House?

Mr. STORM. I am glad to be informed of that. It was not, then, the action of the House, but was the action of the Senate. Therefore the bill which we have to-day before us is precisely the bill which passed the Forty-seventh Congress and was approved by the President, with the exception I have stated.

Mr. SEYMOUR. Did not the bill of 1882 contain the words "or who intentionally deserted," and have not those words been left out of this bill?

Mr. STORM. They were in the law of 1882, and the Secretary of War recommended that they should be left out of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL], a member of the committee.

Mr. ROWELL. As a member of the committee reporting this bill it was my desire to be recognized in my own time, so that I might discuss this question deliberately. It has seemed to me that there has been a disposition to take us off the floor, and therefore I accept the ten minutes so kindly yielded to me by the gentleman in charge of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will correct the gentleman in that respect. No gentleman has spoken except members of the committee or gentlemen to whom members of the committee have yielded their time. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] spoke in the time of a member of the committee.

Mr. ROWELL. Mr. Chairman, unquestionably this bill may need some amendments; but that the purpose of section 2 is wise and beneficent I think no gentleman on this floor having a proper consideration for the honor of the Union Army will deny. If the measure is in the interest of absolute justice, the question whether it may cost more or less money ought not to be considered; but how a bill which provides that this restoration of a man to the rolls shall give no title to back pay or bounty can entail any additional expense, except to the extent that it may add to the pension-roll, I can not understand. Nor can I understand the mathematics by which it is determined that because there are 2,000 applicants for pensions who have the charge of desertion marked against their names, therefore this bill will create 2,000 additional pensioners. In other words, I see no reason for the assumption that every one of those applicants, if the charge of desertion be removed, will be able to make the necessary proof to entitle him to a pension.

It must be remembered, Mr. Chairman, that the Union Army was made up of volunteer soldiers. They were not men educated in war; they had not made war a profession. They were men accustomed to the freedom of civil life; they were not habituated to the severe rules of army discipline. In the early days of 1861 so anxious were young men all over the North to serve their country that they hurried to enroll their names as volunteer soldiers. The result was that men of different temperaments were associated together. Men frequently became members of companies in which they were not acquainted. In many cases men were put under officers who were their inferiors in intelligence, in social standing, and in everything that goes to make up manhood. Those men, thus suddenly brought under the severe discipline of the Army, were at the same time in many instances brought in conjunction with uncongenial companions and placed under officers unfit to command them. On this account the desertions were more numerous than they otherwise would have been—not for lack of patriotism, but because men left a particular company or regiment for the purpose of seeking better associations, with better opportunity of serving the country. Besides, we all know that in the fall of 1862, by reason of certain untoward influences which existed throughout the North, many men were induced to go home who afterward, under the proclamation of the President, returned to their commands.

Now, the question is whether we are to treat these men as we would professional soldiers making the business of arms their life pursuit, or whether we are to treat them as men who knew nothing about military life when they enlisted, who enlisted to fight and did fight, and who, in many cases, when they had deserted went back to the Army, served faithfully and well, and came home wounded and disabled.

The fact that we have received from the War Department the suggestion that there are six or eight classes of men who ought to be relieved is a sufficient evidence that there ought to be something done which was not done by the bill which passed this House to relieve a class of men not included in this bill.

I am ready to confess that I never had the experience of my brother from Indiana with "bounty-jumpers." I never had the experience of men deserting on the battlefield and then coming back to the Army again.

Mr. STEELE. I ask the gentleman what reason he has to infer from anything I have said or from anything he knows in regard to me that I have had any experience with "bounty-jumpers?"

Mr. ROWELL. I can answer the question. The objection raised to this bill by the gentleman from Indiana was that it would benefit "bounty-jumpers" and those who deserted on the battlefield. He seemed to have a great fear that under this bill some dishonorable soldiers would receive the benefits designed for those who served their country honorably. I would rather be deceived a thousand times a year than be always suspicious of my fellow-men, especially those who went into the Army and on the battlefield imperiled their lives for their country.

While there was a large list of desertions, one-half of those desertions could be accounted for by the fact that when a man by any accident was absent without leave his officer marked him on the records as a deserter, though he may have been as gallant a soldier as the man who so marked him and having no more intention to be a deserter. A large number of men marked as deserters went home from hospitals to die. Numbers of others started back to their regiments and were unable to reach them, and so anxious were they to fight that they enlisted in other regiments.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Does not the bill already passed cover such cases?

Mr. ROWELL. No, sir; not a single soldier who deserted and afterward enlisted in another regiment is covered by that bill. Every man who deserted from one regiment and afterward went back and fought in another stands upon the records of his country as a deserter, though he may have come home with a leg or an arm off.

Mr. HISCOCK. Does not the gentleman believe it possible to formulate a measure which will cover such cases?

Mr. ROWELL. I do.

Mr. HISCOCK. Very well. There will be no objection to adopting a measure which will cover that class of cases. But I have pointed out that the provisions of this bill would cover 150,000 others. I have made no argument against removing the charge of desertion in such cases as the gentleman describes. What I complain of is that this bill, while designed to cover such cases, does also in fact cover cases which no one wants to relieve.

Mr. ROWELL. I stated in the outset that possibly this bill would have to be amended; but I do not want to see it amended in such a way as to exclude all those who should be the beneficiaries under it. You can not adopt any general rule which may not in particular cases work some injustice. That result can not be accomplished either in civil or in military life. While we should endeavor, as far as possible, to exclude the bad cases, I would not make a law so rigid that it would exclude the good ones. I know that on the pension-rolls are many men who ought not to receive pensions. But I repeat, you can not make a general law which bad men in some cases will not take advantage of.

All those for whom I have been pleading are practically excluded from the other bill, and the gentleman who reported that bill now seems to be opposed to their being included under this proposition.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ROWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. You have stated a proposition here that attracts my attention very warmly. In other words, you say there was a class of men who went home to hospitals, who were put into hospitals and died there, and who have been carried on the rolls of the Army as deserters. I do not know that is true. You refer also to a class of men who were marked as deserters, and yet who were wounded in battle. I asked a question a moment ago whether the bill we have already passed does not cover that class of cases as well as the bill which the gentleman is now advocating?

Mr. ROWELL. The gentleman misunderstands me.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Just wait for a moment.

Mr. ROWELL. I can not wait a moment longer. I have not the time to wait.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. But I have not finished my question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. ROWELL. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will yield to me for a minute longer.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Certainly.

Mr. ROWELL. The gentleman from Iowa has taken up my time. I said men who had deserted——

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. There is five minutes remaining on either side.

Mr. ROWELL. I said that men who had deserted and then enlisted in other regiments and who were afterward killed in battle. The bill does not cover such cases, and indeed does not cover any one except those who deserted and returned to their command and died after re-enlistment in hospital, or after they had returned home. As I understand the original bill——

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. If one bill does not cover them the other does.

Mr. ROWELL. I can not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I have yielded to others most of the time under my control, and I only wish to add a few words to the debate. All gentlemen concede that some legislation is necessary on this subject. The eminent gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] concedes it. The gentlemen of the Military Committee concede it; every one who has given the subject any consideration concedes it. The question is, what shall that legislation be? I submit that with the amendment which the committee have authorized me to offer to the bill, and which cures the defects which have been suggested, we can afford to pass this bill for the benefit of a large class of men who have been marked on the rolls as deserters inadvertently and improperly.

There were large numbers of brave soldiers who went early to the war, who stood by the flag during all the hours of the nation's danger and shared in the rejoicing of the last great victories, who were anxious to see home and friends, and who, when there were no longer any battles to fight, did not wait for the tedious delays that sometimes preceded the final and formal discharge.

Mr. MAGINNIS rose.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I beg pardon; in the few minutes remaining I can not yield.

The origin of this bill is this: There have been introduced by many members large numbers of special bills for the relief of soldiers who were beyond all doubt brave and worthy men, whose standing and character in their regiments and at home were above reproach; but in many cases they found to their surprise that the rolls at the War Department contained a record of their desertion. What should be their roll of honor was a record of their disgrace, and of unmerited disgrace. In the few moments remaining I can not enumerate these instances. I will only refer to one instance which came to the notice of our committee and which now occurs to me.

A young soldier who was as true and loyal as the average Union soldier—and that is honor enough for any man—learned while in Tennessee of serious illness in his family at home. Anxious as any of us would have been under such circumstances, he told his trouble to his captian. The captain, who perhaps was more kind-hearted than wise, told him to go home, and to return as soon as the condition of his family would warrant. He went to his home. His regiment moved on toward the front. After a few weeks the soldier returned to and rejoined his regiment. In the fortunes of war his captain was killed. The young soldier fought bravely, like his comrades, until the end of the rebellion. Time passed on, and when he made application for a pension he was told that the rolls showed that he who had ventured everything he had on earth was a deserter.

Probably every member of this House has had brought to his attention some case where a soldier was entitled to relief of the kind which this bill will afford.

The committee are not disposed to insist strenuously upon the language of the bill or the amendment. What we desire is some bill which will meet the great number of cases now meriting relief. The Secretary of War recognizes the importance of some action upon this subject. His views are contained in the letter which I have caused to be read.

The objections of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] are fully met by the proposed amendment.

It is proposed that in every case the facts shall pass under the scrutiny of the Secretary of War; that no charge of desertion shall be removed unless the Secretary believes, in view of all the facts, that the relief ought to be given. It is not fair to assume that in every case such soldiers will be entitled to a pension. They must first satisfy the Secretary of War that the charge of desertion is unjust. They must then prove, like other soldiers, their disability. If they can pass these ordeals they ought to have their pensions, and it would be simply an outrage to deny them.

And now I will say that I have no greater admiration for bounty-jumpers than any one else. I shall not become their defender or apologist. It is barely possible that while ninety-nine brave fellows will have removed from their military record an undeserved stigma and disgrace one bounty-jumper may also obtain a relief which he does not deserve; but that shall not deter me from doing justice to the deeply wronged men for whose benefit this bill is framed.

While my time remains I move that the committee rise for the purpose of limiting general debate.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Allow me to send up a proposed amendment. I believe after gentlemen hear it they will accept it. I have that confidence in it.

Mr. STEELE. Who does the gentleman yield to?

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I insist on my motion that the committee rise for the purpose of closing general debate. The gentleman from Indiana can offer his amendment hereafter.

Mr. HISCOCK. Is it in order to move that the bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be recommitted to the Committee on War Claims with the pending amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. It will not be until general debate has been exhausted; then amendments will be in order.

The motion of Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin, was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole House had, according to order, had under consideration the Private Calendar, and particularly the bill (H. R. 3935) to relieve certain soldiers of the late war from the charge of desertion, but had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I move that all general debate on the pending bill in the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be limited to one hour on each side.

Mr. STEELE. I move to amend by making it thirty minutes, fifteen minutes on each side.

The amendment was agreed to, and the motion as amended was adopted.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin, moved that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3935) to relieve certain soldiers of the late war from the charge of desertion, and, by order of the House, all general debate has been limited to thirty minutes, fifteen minutes on each side.

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Chairman, I did not understand the motion of the gentleman from Indiana to limit this debate to thirty minutes, fifteen on each side. My understanding was that thirty minutes on each side were to be allowed. I should be glad to have a statement from the Chair upon that point.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that by the action of the House all general debate on this bill has been limited to fifteen minutes on each side.

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Chairman, I must confess myself a little surprised that upon a bill involving a matter of such magnitude as is involved in this bill, the time for this discussion should have been thus restricted. It has been shown already, by a number of gentlemen who have addressed the committee, preceding me, that this bill possibly involves the expenditure of some millions of dollars, and to my mind matters of more consequence than even the millions that have been referred to, and that is, the welfare and well-being of those of our gallant soldiers who served well in the Army during the time of our nation's peril, but who, influenced during the last days of the war by the hardships and perils they had so patiently and courageously endured to that time, and believing the war had practically closed, and having before their mind's eye and their soul's door the memory of home and loved ones, left for that home and those loved ones and stood not on the order of their going; nor had they thoughts of the possible consequences to their reputation as valiant soldiers and honorable men, neither the questions of how their said acts might affect their purse, their standing as to patriotism, or the possibilities of tarnished reputations as a lasting heritage to wife, children, childrens' children, and other relatives and friends.

I am exceedingly regretful, therefore, that my time should be limited to fifteen minutes, for I desire, as a member of the committee who drafted the bill, to present my reasons fully and to elaborate carefully the grounds that induced me in the Committee on War Claims to support the bill and which induce me now to give it my sanction.

I find that there has come to me in the last few weeks a large number of cases wherein desires are expressed and requests made that they be relieved by act of Congress from the charges of desertion resting against them, and also I am in receipt of the most urgent appeals by gallant soldiers against whom no charges of desertion rest that an act be passed by this Congress relieving their comrades from such blight on their otherwise fair name and fame. While I have no time in the brief moments allotted to me to read much of the correspondence that I have on my desk, I now ask permission to print such of it in the RECORD as a part of my remarks as may seem proper to further disclose my views and the reasons for the position I assume.

The following letter, sent to me by Hon. S. Kirkpatrick, of Ottumwa, Iowa, indicates the views of an old soldier and as true a man to the cause of the Union as can be found in the State:

OTTUMWA, IOWA, January 28, 1884.

DEAR SIR: I return you the letter requested. I am of the opinion that it was the intention of the father of the bill referred to that the charge of desertion should be removed from all soldiers who willfully left their commands at the close of the war. Their actions in the literal construction of the law would be desertion, but not in a very aggravated form. The father of the bill (Ben. Butterworth, I think, of Ohio, now deceased), after consultation with that class of deserters, presented the bill, and he understood that it should apply to those men who, tired of service and knowing full well that the war was virtually at an end, left their commands and are regarded as deserters. They have never been discharged. Neither have they received pay for a considerable length of time before quitting their commands. As near as could be ascertained there were about ten thousand of these men, and they now ask for relief, to be discharged, and to receive compensation for their services. I think the case has been fairly presented, and in their behalf I ask your honorable self to act.

Yours,

S. KIRKPATRICK.

Hon. L. H. WELLER.

I sent this particular letter to the honorable the Secretary of War, Robert Lincoln, and from him received the following reply:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, January 22, 1884.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 19th instant inclosing one addressed to yourself by Mr. S. Kirkpatrick, in which he states that an act of Congress was passed several years ago by both Houses, and signed by the President, removing charges of desertion against certain soldiers and stating that the Secretary of War, naming myself, in some way declared some "technicality" in the law and thus made it a dead letter, you asking in your letter to be directed to the law and to the ruling of the Secretary of War and to the method of correcting the technical objection declared by the Secretary, I have the honor to advise you that the statute referred to by your correspondent is undoubtedly the act "to relieve certain soldiers of the late war from the charge of desertion," approved August 7, 1882 (22 Stats. at Large, 347).

The "technicality" referred to by Mr. Kirkpatrick is a provision which was inserted in the act while it was considered in the Senate after it had passed in the House of Representatives, that no soldier should be entitled to the benefit of the act who intentionally deserted, which will be found in the fourth section of the act. Therefore, when it has appeared in an application that the soldier in whose case the application is made was a deserter, it has been uniformly held that he was not entitled to the benefit of the act. The subject was discussed by me in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives, and my answer to the House on the subject under date of December 15, 1882, is printed as Executive Document No. 20, House of Representatives, Forty-seventh Congress, second session, a copy of which is herewith inclosed. I believe that in that communication all of your questions are answered as fully as I am able to respond to them.

The letter to you from Mr. Kirkpatrick, which is dated Ottumwa, Iowa, January 14, 1884, is returned to you herewith as requested.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ROBERT T. LINCOLN,
Secretary of War.

Hon. L. H. WELLER,
House of Representatives.

Said Secretary also inclosed to me, as a part of his reply, the following communication made by him in response to a resolution on the part of the House of Representatives, calling for information relating to the act of August 7, 1882, which is in words and figures following, to wit:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, December 15, 1882.

SIR: In response to the resolution of the House of Representatives, adopted on the 12th instant, by which the Secretary of War is directed to furnish the House the following information, namely, what action has been taken, under the act of August 7, 1882, "to relieve certain soldiers of the late war from the charge of desertion," what changes in the former law have been decided by the War Department to have been made by said act, and what classes of soldiers charged with desertion have been considered by the War Department to be embraced by the said act, and, further, what additional legislation is deemed necessary to enable him to carry out the provisions of the first and second sections of said act, I have the honor to state that no action has been taken under the above-mentioned act other than a careful consideration of its terms and of various official views and professional arguments as to its effect, and the preparation of a decision by myself, which was at the time the resolution was adopted in readiness to be given to the Adjutant-General for his guidance in the disposition of cases presented to the Department. A copy of this decision is herewith submitted.

It will be seen therefrom that I consider myself compelled by the terms of the act to exclude from its benefit any soldier who deserted, or who, in other words, quitted the military service without leave with the intention of not returning, certainly at any time before the 20th day of August, 1866, the date ascertained by the Supreme Court of the United States for the termination of the war.

No case has been brought to my attention of a volunteer soldier who enlisted "for three years or during the war" and deserted after that date. By that time nearly all the volunteer forces had been mustered out of service.

Inasmuch, therefore, as I consider myself prohibited by the act from removing a charge of desertion when it was originally entered correctly and in accordance with the facts, and as on the other hand the Secretary of War has always deemed himself authorized by law to remove or correct a charge when he was satisfied that the soldier in question had not committed the military crime of desertion as above defined, but not to remove it if correctly entered, it is considered that no increase of authority in removing charges of desertion has been given by the act. It may not be improper to add here that it has not been, as I am advised, the practice of the Department in any case to remove literally or expunge a charge of desertion. The record of a soldier once so charged will always show the fact that the charge was made. Any removal or change is merely indicated by a subsequent entry to that effect.

In response to the last inquiry, as to what additional legislation is deemed necessary to enable the Secretary of War to carry out the provisions of the first and second sections of said act, it will be necessary to consider the two sections separately. Under the first section of the act read alone it would be the duty of the Secretary of War in all cases to remove a charge of desertion now standing on the rolls against any soldier of the volunteer service who served in the late war if he served faithfully until the expiration of his term of enlistment or until the 22d day of May, 1865, or was prevented from completing his term of service by reason of wounds received or disease contracted in the line of duty.

The section embraces all cases in the three classes, and that without regard to the length of their service previous to desertion. Its operation is, however, restricted by the last proviso of the fourth section, which says that no soldier who served in the Army a period of less than twelve months, or who intentionally deserted, shall be included in the benefit of the provisions of the act. In my opinion, therefore, further legislation repealing the last proviso of the fourth section is necessary to enable the Secretary of War to carry out the provisions of the first section.

No additional legislation is deemed necessary to carry out the provisions of the second section, as it stands alone, for the reason that it is not considered to give any new authority to the Secretary of War, as it merely directs the correction of the charge of desertion erroneously made. If, however, it did give such new authority, it should be remarked that the last proviso of the fourth section excludes from its operation soldiers who served less than twelve months.

The views which I have expressed as to the operation of the bill have not been reached without much reflection, and even hesitation, for they are in effect that the bill which passed the House on the 7th of April, 1882, the provisions of which were plain and harmonious, was, by two of the subsequent amendments, one in the second section and the other in the fourth section, so changed that as finally passed by Congress, instead of authorizing as it did when it first passed the House certain action in a particular class of cases for which authority did not before exist, it directly prohibited such action. No other conclusion has seemed to me possible without ascribing to the crime of desertion as referred to in this act some element as yet undefined in addition to those which have so long without question been held to complete the offense. I find no authority in the act for so doing.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ROBERT T. LINCOLN,
Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MEMORANDUM.

The first section of the act of Congress approved August 7, 1882, entitled "An act to relieve certain soldiers of the late war from the charge of desertion," makes it the duty of the Secretary of War to cause the charge of desertion against volunteer soldiers to be removed in cases where it shall be made to appear to his satisfaction, from the official records, or from other satisfactory testimony, that the soldier so charged had—

First. Served faithfully until the expiration of his term of enlistment;

Second. Had served until the 22d day of May, 1865; or,

Third. Was prevented from completing his term of service by reason of wounds received or disease contracted in the line of duty, the Secretary being directed by this section to remove the charge of desertion in cases coming within its provisions where, by reason of absence from his command at the time it was mustered out, a soldier failed to be mustered out and to receive an honorable discharge.

The second section is simple in its provisions, and governs those cases in which the soldier returned after unauthorized absence and served faithfully, he never having intended to desert.

The third section directs the issue of a certificate of discharge upon the removal of the charge of desertion.

The fourth section, after providing for payment of withheld pay and bounty, provides that no soldier who served in the Army a period of less than twelve months or who intentionally deserted shall be entitled to the benefits of the provisions of this act.

The two principal questions raised under the act requiring decisions are as follows:

First. It is urged that no volunteer soldier who enlisted for three years or during the war can be properly held to have deserted after the 22d day of May, 1865. This is urged on the ground that, from the whole act, it appears that Congress has decided that the war ended on the 22d day of May, 1865. As the act now reads, it is certainly difficult to assign any good reason for the use of those words in the first section, but it would require more definite expressions of Congress than are to be found in the act to assign a date for the termination of the war other than the 20th of August, 1866, which is the date ascertained by a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States for its termination, under which the Attorney-General (16 Opinions, 675) decided that volunteer soldiers who in July, 1875, committed the acts constituting the crime of desertion, were properly charged with that crime. The Attorney-General said:

"So long as, in the judgment of the political department, the objects of the war had not been attained and secured, the Army was to remain upon the alert to resist any violence, direct or collateral, principal or incidental, that might arise to jeopardize success. In such a condition of things, it seems impossible to allow soldiers to draw distinctions involving the degree or direction of the professional service which they are to render."

Second. It has been suggested that in excepting from the benefits of the act soldiers who "intentionally deserted," Congress did not intend to except all soldiers who left the military service without permission with the intention of not returning, but that distinctions should be made, taken from the motives of the soldier, his own personal circumstances, or the situation and probable direction of the command of which he was a part, and that this intention of Congress is to be gathered from the whole act, and particularly from the use of the words "intentionally deserted," instead of the simple word "deserted."

I am not able to perceive any distinction between desertion and intentional desertion, desertion being a clearly defined military crime which can not be committed without intention. To desert is to quit the military service without leave and with an intent to remain permanently absent therefrom. If a soldier absents himself without leave, but there is in the case an absence of proof, either in his declarations or in the circumstances attending the act, or in his subsequent conduct, that he had the intention of not returning, his offense is not desertion, but absence without leave. If, therefore, it was, as urged, the intention of Congress that the charge of desertion should be removed from the record of a soldier (he having served at least twelve months) who served faithfully (1) until the expiration of his term of enlistment, or (2) until May 22, 1865, even if he then quitted the service with the intention of not returning, then, in order to carry out the actual legislative intention, it would be necessary to disregard the exception above mentioned as repugnant to the body of the act, for such a soldier intentionally deserted, and would be within the exception.

It is not, however, clearly within the meaning of the act, or any part of it, that it was to benefit a soldier who absented himself without leave with the intention of not returning, or in other words, who deserted. The act itself is not an act for the relief of deserters, but of those charged with desertion. A fair construction of the first and third clauses of the first section would seem to be that the absence referred to was of a character susceptible of explanation, and that the soldier, if present at the muster-out of his command, would have been entitled to an honorable discharge. Each case mentioned in the first section is carefully described not as a deserter, but as one "who, by reason of absence from his command at the time the same was mustered out, failed to be mustered out and to receive an honorable discharge," and if the deserters (or intentional deserters, if the expression is preferred) are excluded from the benefits of this act, it still describes a very large number of cases of soldiers charged with desertion, but against whom there is no evidence of desertion in its proper sense other than the charge on the rolls.

There would seem, therefore, to be no room for the application of the rule of construction which requires that an exception should be disregarded which is repugnant to the body of the act, and the charge of desertion will therefore not be removed in any case where it appears that the soldier, before the expiration of his term of enlistment, quitted the military service without leave with the intention of not returning, as, in my opinion, such removal is prohibited by the express terms of the act.

ROBERT T. LINCOLN,
Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
December 12, 1882.

I find in these communications that there is a widespread desire among many honorable and patriotic men to have these charges of desertion wiped out from the records of the War Department, and to have such parties placed on the muster-out rolls of the proper Department as being honorably discharged. By the said report of Secretary Lincoln it will be seen that the bill which passed the House during the Forty-seventh Congress was so amended in the Senate that it became wholly inoperative in giving relief in any case that came to the attention of the War Department—first, for the reason that it was held that no soldier could leave his regiment or the service without permission before the 20th day of August, 1866, the date ascertained by the Supreme Court of the United States as the date of the termination of the war, except the charge of desertion be attached, saving of course, that he quitted without the intention of returning; and I aver that none intended to return who left for home, wife, and loved ones after May 1, 1865.

The said Secretary in his said response, on the third page thereof, states, "It has been suggested that in excepting from the benefits of the act soldiers who 'intentionally deserted' Congress did not intend to except all soldiers who left the military service without permission with the intention of not returning, but that distinction should be made, taken from the motives of the soldier, his own personal circumstances, or the situation and probable direction of the command of which he was a part, and that this intention of Congress is to be gathered from the whole act, and particularly from the use of the words 'intentionally deserted,' instead of the simple word 'deserted.'"

The finding and conclusion of the Secretary of War was that he was unable to perceive any distinction between the words "intentionally deserted" and "deserted."

I have no desire to be a party to placing bounty-jumpers and willful deserters on the same footing as honorably discharged soldiers, but I hold to the statement that there were hundreds of patriotic men who had suffered all the ills and hardships and perils of war life, who could no longer resist the temptation to leave for home to see the loved ones and to care for, provide for, protect and cherish them, and therefore stood not on the order of going, nor had care of contingent results.

I here present a letter received by me from a soldier residing in my district, but who was detailed for service near the close of his term of enlistment, and at the date of the muster-out of his company he was far absent from the rendezvous of his command, and therefore failed to receive his proper vouchers for honorable discharge from service and is to-day accounted as a deserter.

This letter is accompanied by a certificate made and signed by the adjutant-general of the State of Wisconsin, certifying the fact of enlistment and such absence with no record of honorable discharge, which said certificate is in words and figures following, to wit:

BROWNSVILLE, IOWA, March 31, 1884.

DEAR SIR: I have a claim against the Government for services in the volunteer service as member of Company D, Thirty-ninth Wisconsin Regiment, for which I have never had any pay. I was on detached service in Madison until about four weeks before the regiment came home. I was then ordered to report to the regiment in Milwaukee, when they returned on the 12th of September, 1864. I enlisted in Company K, First Wisconsin Heavy Artillery, and was in Madison when the Thirty-ninth returned, and failed to get mustered out of the Thirty-ninth.

Will you please put the case before the proper Department, and oblige,

Very respectfully, yours,

J. B. NOBLE.

Hon. L. H. WELLER.

STATE OF WISCONSIN, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE.

This is to certify that the records of this office show that James B. Noble, late a private in Company D, of the Thirty-ninth Regiment of Wisconsin Infantry Volunteers, enlisted at Burlington, Wis., on the 18th day of May, 1864, for the term of one hundred days; was mustered into the military service of the United States at Camp Washburn, Wisconsin, on the 3d day of June, 1864, by Capt. J. B. Collins.

There is no muster-out roll of Company D on file in this office, but the records of the office show that the Thirty-ninth Regiment was mustered out at Camp Washburn, Wisconsin, 22d day of September, 1864, on the expiration of its term of service.

The records further show that said soldier when enlisted was 18 years of age.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my official seal, at the capitol in the city of Madison, this 8th day of March, A. D. 1884.

[SEAL.] C. P. CHAPMAN,
Adjutant-General.

I believe this bill is one that has already been too long delayed. Relief to such as are mentioned in the terms of this bill should have been granted long ago. Indeed, the stigma that now rests on their names can no longer serve the purposes of good government or invoke patriotism on the part of those that suffer under its baneful influences.

I was not at the front in the hour of our country's peril, but I had relatives there very near and dear to me. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, I will desist until we can have order in the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. WELLER. And because of the sufferings and inflictions which I know they underwent, I desire that the relief proposed by this bill shall be granted, not only to such as may be near and dear to me, but also to the multitude who are of no kin but who served the country faithfully, but by reasons of rulings of a superior power and their lack of great and very particular caution, under the temptations which the circumstances of the then present occasion presented, they left the service without proper permit, and to-day are—not only themselves, but their relatives and friends also—under the stigma of desertion.

I am certain of the fact, Mr. Chairman, that there are thousands who went to the front and fought valiantly for the old flag and for the life of the nation who are now suffering under the stigma that rests against their names in the War Department.

Mr. HANBACK. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WELLER. Certainly.

Mr. HANBACK. I understand you to say that you are interested in this bill because it applies to kinsmen of yours who are near and dear to you.

Mr. WELLER. I not only said that, sir, but I said also that I was interested in the bill because it applied to thousands of others who were not of blood kin to me and who had served their country faithfully.

Mr. HANBACK. Will you permit another question?

Mr. WELLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HANBACK. Do I understand, then, that you have kinsfolk upon the rolls of the country who were deserters?

Mr. WELLER. I have [great laughter], and under this bill I want to say that they are relieved by proper form of law from an unjust stain. I want to say further, Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from Kansas, that I have kinsfolk that fought for the life of this Union in the hour of their country's peril, and who went through such sufferings as that they were inspired in the closing hours or days of the war to leave the Army to go to their homes to see mother or father or wife or children, and at a time or under circumstances that they had not time to return, had not time to get proper certificate or formal record of discharge, and the result was that they are placed upon the rolls as deserters. This was the case with men who were as true to the old flag as ever went to the front at any time. But yet to-day not only these people but their children and their children's children are living under the ban of desertion, and I would have them relieved of that stain.

The objection is made to this bill by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] that it will take millions of dollars out of the Treasury. I want to know what those millions are there for. I want to know why we shall not take these millions out and pay them to those that suffered for years as thousands did at the front. Too long have the soldiers been paid in undying gratitude; now let us pay him in hard cash, honest silver dollars. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, I believe that there is but one single objection that can be or will be urged, in very truth, to having these millions paid out of the Treasury, and that is that it would increase the volume of money in circulation. [Laughter.] I know what the effect upon the business interests of this country would be by increasing the volume of money in circulation. It would take the business interests of the great Northwest and the West and the Southwest and the South out of the hands of the Shylocks that control the finances and the commercial interests of this country, and they are to-day residing on Wall street in New York, and Chestnut street in Philadelphia, and have their syndicates scattered throughout all of the large cities of the Union. That is the great objection, and it is really the only objection that has in truth and fact been raised to passing the bill for the payment of back pay and bounty years ago.

Now, in the time that is left me I wish to read a petition that is being sent to me by the hundred from the soldiers of the Grand Army of the Republic. I have been trying, as was stated by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], for weeks to get this petition before this House and secure for it an honorable place in the records of the proceedings of this body. I will now read it:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, ex-soldiers and sailors of the late war, and their friends do most respectfully and earnestly petition your honorable bodies to enact the following laws:

First. To appreciate our pay to gold value at the time it was due, together with annual interest until paid.

Second. To equalize the bounties.

Believing that these measures are eminently just and, in accordance with promises, a very important part of the obligations which this great nation owes to its defenders, who went through untold hardships, dangers, and death, upheld her flag in the dark and trying hours of the rebellion, restoring her unity and all inherent interests secured thereby, enabling her people to resume with grander prospects the pursuits of happiness and prosperity unknown to any other nation, and hoping that the representatives of this Government will concur in the justice and equity of the above measures, your petitioners will ever pray.

It is true that by the aid of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] I this morning received the recognition of having this petition, which I have tried here for weeks to have printed in the RECORD, so printed. I did not secure the printing of the names. I now propose, in my time, to read the names attached to this petition:

S. N. Brace, of Fredericksburg, Iowa; H. A. Pond, A. J. Warren, James Mitchell, Colonel Whitcomb, R. W. Kidder, William Case, R. B. Gardiner, M. P. Butler, R. D. Blake, Otis Lyze, J. D. Dahnall, J. Ellis, M. R. Benedict, B. B. Botler, M. V. Box, John Brockway, General Milo L. Sherman.

And here I wish to say in regard to the name of General Milo L. Sherman that not only did he go to the front in the hour of our country's peril, but he is recognized through the State of Iowa as among the most brilliant and patriotic of men that left home and all to follow and fight for the flag and to secure a victory for the nation as a union of States under a common constitution.

I now read the other names following:

Thomas Miner, John H. Ellison, H. B. Carpenter, John Dayton, Frank M. Appleberry, Joseph Ellison, Henry Beaver, E A. Churchill.

Not only these men whose names which I have read, but thousands of others have been praying in season and out of season to the Congress of the United States to grant the relief that is indicated in this petition. Why have they not had it all these years? There have been millions piled in the Treasury, locked up from circulation, doing no more good to the business interests of the country than would one-half or two-thirds of the life-blood circulating in our bodies if taken out and put in a receptacle and laid away. What has been the reason? I repeat, and I want to emphasize the statement, the only reason in the world is that to do justice to the soldiers would increase the volume of money in circulation and take the business interests of the country out of the hands of those who have been preying thereon for years, and who are at the head of every corporate monopoly that is sucking the life-blood out of the people.

Returning again to this bill, I will say I am in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JONES]. While I am in favor of that, I will say that I only accede to it for the reason that I doubt whether the bill would pass without it. I have been most agreeably surprised to find that the gentlemen, with a few exceptions, on the Democratic side of the House have been generous, so far as my knowledge of their acts this session is concerned—have ever been generous in their propositions to aid the soldiers who were in the Union armies, while I find several gentlemen on the Republican side of the House who are making strong and determined opposition to the relief proposed by the terms of this bill, which terms, as I understand it, are practically indorsed by the present Secretary of War, Robert Lincoln.

I deplore it. I deplore the fact that any Republican can be found on this floor who is less willing to be generous, as indicated in this bill, than many others present who served under the confederate flag. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] makes a computation of the sum of money that it would take from the United States Treasury if this bill were to pass, and he and his compeers seem to be using every element of power and eloquence they are the possessors of to hold such soldiers who served so faithfully to the strict line and letter of the law that existed at the close of the war, yet making no allowance, proper, it seems to me, for circumstances surrounding, inducements presented that were an overpowering temptation to leave the service without such permits as would leave them an honorable standing among their fellows, who are in truth and fact no more worthy than they, but were the happy possessors of less impetuosity, more stolid indifference to home and home influences and home surroundings.

Why should we not give immunity to these men? Here we find those who served in the army against the Union, those who were in the army of the rebellion. But these confederates have been granted immunity, have had their political disabilities removed, the right of franchise restored, and that means a restoration of citizenship; and yet, forsooth, because of desertions under circumstances such as enumerated by the chairman of our Committee on War Claims [Mr. GEDDES] and others, no proper relief can be had as in my judgment ought to be granted. I can not see why such a distinction should be made, except that the one class could not hope for or expect to receive any dollars from the United States Treasury, while it is certain that the others would.

I had a brother who was in the Army. He served faithfully beyond his term of enlistment; he was weary and sick with forced marches, bad provisions, worse water, and outrageous lack of attention; he had been anxiously looking and longing for the time to come when he could leave the service and go to his home and see mother. He was heart-broken with homesickness, and when the news came that he was to be permitted to go, to leave for home—he was then on the shores of the Mississippi River—he started to the boat-landing with others, and I am informed by one who claimed to be an eye-witness that he died with overjoy, coupled with physical weakness, and was there hurriedly buried.

It requires no stretch of imagination to come to the conclusion that only a slight inducement coupled with favorable circumstances would have induced my brother John to have deserted the service as thousands did, concluding that their time was fairly out, or that the war was really at an end, or the more potential reason that absence from home and the loved ones for months or years had induced conditions of mind and body such as to subject their judgment to its ruling sway, and moved them to disregard a wiser course, perchance, and await the red-tape methods of the officials under whom they served.

In conclusion, I desire to state my hope that the Democratic side of this House will show its magnanimity, in return for the immunity granted to the confederate soldiers by restoration of citizenship and as they have in other instances of like character this session, to the soldiers and vote for this bill. If opposition must come, I hope it will come as it appears so far to have come, from the Republican side of this House as represented by the two gentlemen from Indiana [Messrs. STEELE and BROWNE] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK].

Mr. STEELE. I yield three minutes to my colleague from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE].

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I will employ, Mr. Chairman, the three minutes allotted to me in asking the attention of the committee to an amendment which I now offer, if it be in order. If not in order now, it will be when the bill comes to be considered by paragraphs for amendment. I hope the committee will give attention to its reading.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the first and second sections and insert:

"That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed, in his discretion and upon satisfactory evidence, to relieve from the charge of desertion the following:

"First. Men charged with desertion who voluntarily returned within thirty days and served honorably to the end of their term of service.

"Second. Men who deserted from hospital, or from furlough given from a hospital, while suffering from wounds, injuries, or disease received or contracted in the service and line of duty, and who on recovery returned voluntarily to the service, and served honorably until discharged, or who died from such wounds.

injuries, or disease while so absent, and before the date of muster-out of their regiments.

"Third. Men who returned under the President's proclamation and served honorably until discharged.

"Fourth. Men who left the service without proper authority (and thereby became deserters) for the purpose of relieving their families residing within the enemy's lines from distress or want, and who returned voluntarily and served honor ably until discharged.

"Fifth. Men who, while awaiting exchange, deserted from parol camp, or while on furlough from a parol camp or other authoritative source, and who voluntarily returned and served honorably until discharged.

"Sixth. Men who deserted from a furlough given by any authoritative source, and who, during such absence died from wounds inflicted by the enemy or disease contracted in the service before the muster-out of their commands."

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If I have any time remaining I will return it to my colleague [Mr. STEELE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] has twelve minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I hope the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] will include in his amendment those also who left their regiments after the close of the war, which I believe was May 25, 1865.

Mr. STEELE. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. ROSECRANS].

Mr. ROSECRANS. There are a few points to which I desire to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole. The first is that the Committee on Military Affairs had before it some fifty or sixty private bills for correction of muster-rolls and for relief in cases of this kind. All of those bills were considered by the committee and a general bill prepared and reported to the House which it was believed would cover almost all the cases before the committee. That bill was House bill No. 4383, and it passed the House on the 18th of February last.

Since we reported that bill we have learned of two or three other classes of cases which were not covered by it and which probably ought to have been included. As the main provisions of that bill were carefully considered and adapted to secure substantial justice without opening the door too widely, and as the bill is now before the Senate, I think legislation satisfactory to almost all gentlemen on this floor whose friends through them have been asking for relief can be more speedily reached by the proper amendments to be made in the Senate. I think the bill of the House, properly amended by the Senate, will meet the additional cases which had escaped our attention.

With regard to the bill now before the Committee of the Whole, section 1 proposes to correct the record of any "soldier who served faithfully until the expiration of his term of enlistment, or until the 22d day of May, A. D. 1865." If that shall pass it will provide for those proper and just cases where soldiers technically deserted after the 25th of May. There may be a great many bad cases that would be included, but I think words can be chosen so as to exclude the bad ones and give relief to the others.

Section 2 of the bill as it now stands will open a very wide door. It provides for granting relief to any soldier charged with desertion who "voluntarily returned to his command or who subsequently enlisted in another regiment or company and served in the line of his duty until he was mustered out of the service and received a certificate of honorable discharge." That would admit those who deserted for the purpose of re-enlisting and gaining a bounty. I will send up to be read an amendment which I wish to offer to section 2, if it be now in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is not now open to amendment.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I ask that it be read as a portion of my remarks, and give notice that I will offer it at the proper time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, after the words "who subsequently enlisted in another regiment or company," the words "without having done so to escape punishment for misconduct, or without having received any bounty or pecuniary reward therefor."

Mr. ROSECRANS. For reasons which I have already stated to the committee, in my opinion we shall reach the results which are desired by the friends of good and honest soldiers by a shorter process if we lay this bill aside and do nothing with it, and depend upon having inserted in the House bill now before the Senate the amendments which can be shown to be just and proper, or to have the proper amendments made after the bill shall have been returned to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEELE. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD] in his remarks on Friday last, referring to me, said that his experience with bounty-jumpers had probably not been so great as mine. And the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] to-day said the same thing. Now, I want to say to those gentlemen that they can perhaps reflect upon me, but they can not reflect upon my regiment.

I served from April 23, 1861, until the close of the war, and nearly ten years subsequently, and I say that no man, I care not where he comes from, ever served with more gallant men than I did, both in the volunteer and in the regular service. From first to last there were 1,560 names on the rolls of the regiment to which I belonged; and when we came to be mustered out in July, 1865, there were but three hundred and fifty-five of them left, and there had been only sixteen desertions from the regiment.

I belonged to an army and to a regiment that were never whipped. We had no bounty-jumpers; we had no men who deserted and enlisted again. I did not belong to an army that on the 29th day of August, 1862, lay within the sound of our own guns and the sound of the enemy's guns without ever moving a foot to the assistance of their fellow-soldiers. I can not say as much for the gentleman from Nebraska. I do not lay the fault with him or his comrades, but to his corps commander; but I say that I was fortunate in not being with such a command.

If my regiment was whipped at all, it was because the army of Chickamauga was whipped in 1863. If we were whipped then, my regiment and probably my division was whipped. But I give you my word of honor that I did not know it, nor did my regiment know it until after we had marched back to Rossville, Ga., where we arrived after midnight on the 20th of September, 1863, and no regiment of that gallant army left the Chickamauga field after mine.

Now, a word in regard to all this slopping over about the soldiers and the quoting of the gentleman from Indiana as having a heart steeled against them. Do gentlemen recollect that on the 8th day of February I reported back to this House ninety bills looking to the removal of charges of desertion; that I had examined every one of those bills, examined them carefully, and in their stead reported back a general bill which has been passed by this House, and which covered every meritorious case? Of those ninety cases only three were cases of men who had enlisted in one regiment and then deserted from it and gone to another. I have introduced and by direction of my committee reported a bill mustering officers and enlisted men who were commissioned and not mustered through no fault or neglect on their part, and it passed the House. I have introduced and by direction of my committee have reported a bill, which is on the Calendar and I hope will pass, that make enlistment, acceptance into service, sufficient evidence of soundness prior to enlistment and give arrears to soldiers and widows who have applied or may since July 1, 1880; also, a bill to equalize the bounties—a sufficient answer, I hope.

But, Mr. Chairman, men who after enlisting in one regiment deserted and enlisted in another regiment have not the temerity as a rule to come here and ask for relief, because they in most cases belonged to the class of men known as "bounty-jumpers." You say by this bill if a man enlisted in one regiment and re-enlisted in another, that it should not be treated as an offense. I grant you that there are instances of that kind where no blame may attach; but suppose a man enlists in one regiment as "Smith" and deserts, enlists in another regiment as "Jones" and deserts, enlists in another regiment as "Brown" and deserts, and so on until finally when the war closes he occupies a position probably as teamster, hospital nurse, or some other position involving no danger; should the charge of desertion against him be removed because at last he received an honorable discharge, although during the course of the war he may have re-enlisted twenty or thirty times, receiving a bounty each time? How are you going to find out that such was not the fact? There is no way of doing it.

Why, sir, at Indianapolis, Ind., while the bounty-jumping was going on, there was a case in which four men were shot; and one of those men—my friend from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] will remember the case—confessed that he had deserted and re-enlisted thirty times. In New York, as I have been informed upon authority which I do not doubt, men went from one recruiting office to another, enlisting again and again, making it a matter of business and realizing large amounts of money, though probably they never went to the front until the close of the war.

Another objectionable feature in this bill is that it requires no service. A man may have enlisted on the 15th of May and deserted on the 23d of the same month without having performed any service; yet this bill relieves him.

I wish to say that in the bill already passed provision is made that where men served conscientiously till the close of the war and then in the exuberance of their joy, after May 1, 1865, went home to their families without awaiting formal discharge, the charge of desertion shall be removed. That class of men is provided for by the bill already passed. It also——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The time for general debate, as limited by order of the House, has now expired. The first section of the bill will now be read, after which the bill will be open for amendment.

The first section of the bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the charge of desertion now standing on the rolls and records in the office of the Adjutant-General of the United States against any soldier who served in the late war in the volunteer service shall be removed in all cases where it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War, from such rolls and records, or from other satisfactory testimony, that any such soldier served faithfully until the expiration of his term of enlistment, or until the 22d day of May, A. D. 1865, or was prevented from completing his term of service by reason of wounds received or disease contracted in the line of duty, but who, by reason of absence from his command at the time the same was mustered out, failed to be mustered out and to receive an honorable discharge.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I desire to offer a substitute for both the first and second sections. May I make that motion now, or must I wait until the second section has been read?

Mr. HOBLITZELL. I have an amendment to the first section.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to offer an amendment to the first section.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I move to strike out the first section and insert the provision which I send to the desk.

Mr. DINGLEY. Are not amendments designed to perfect the section in order before a substitute? I send up such an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana proposes to strike out the first section altogether and insert a new provision. That motion may be pending; but before the question is taken on striking out the first section amendments to perfect that section are in order. The gentleman from Maryland proposes an amendment to perfect the first section, which will be read, after which the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY].

Mr. STEELE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. This bill being the substance of another bill already passed, would a point of order lie against its further consideration?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the point of order comes too late. The consideration of the bill has already proceeded.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Another good reason why the point of order would not lie is that this bill is not like the one already passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not consider that question any further. The amendment of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HOBLITZELL] will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 10 strike out "22d" and insert "1st," so as to read "until the 1st day of May, 1865."

Mr. HOBLITZELL. This amendment is necessary in view of the fact that the disbandment of the Army of the Potomac was at an earlier date than that of the Army of the Southwest.

Mr. DINGLEY. That amendment is similar to the one which I sought to offer. I hope it will be adopted. It simply puts the first section in the same shape in which it passed this House in the Forty-seventh Congress.

The amendment of Mr. HOBLITZELL was agreed to.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I move to strike out the first section of the bill and in lieu thereof to insert what I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed, in his discretion and upon satisfactory evidence to relieve from the charge of desertion the following:

First. Men charged with desertion who voluntarily returned within thirty days and served honorably to the end of their term of service.

Second. Men who deserted from hospital, or from furlough given from a hospital, while suffering from wounds, injuries, or disease received or contracted in the service and line of duty, and who on recovery returned voluntarily and served honorably until discharged, or who died from such wounds, injury, or disease while so absent and before the date of muster-out of their regiments.

Third. Men who returned under the President's proclamation and served honorably until discharged.

Fourth. Men who left the service without proper authority and thereby became deserters for the purpose of relieving their families residing within the enemy's lines from distress or want, and who returned voluntarily and served honorably until discharged.

Fifth. Men who, while awaiting exchange, deserted from parol camp, or while on furlough from the parol camp or other authoritative source, and who voluntarily returned and served honorably until discharged.

Sixth. Men who deserted from a furlough given by any authoritative source, and who during such absence died from wounds inflicted by the enemy or disease contracted in the service before the muster-out of their commands.

Seventh. Men who deserted or left one command solely for the purpose of joining another, and did join another command within thirty days thereafter and served until the end of the war and were honorably discharged.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the first six clauses contemplated by the amendment are those suggested by the Secretary of War, and if gentlemen of the committee have paid attention to the reading of the amendment they will have discovered it includes certainly every possible case of merit. But it was thought by gentlemen the classes suggested by the Secretary of War did not sufficiently include those men who were to be relieved by the bill, and I therefore inserted a seventh class, covering those who deserted one command solely for the purpose of joining another command and who did join such other command within thirty days thereafter and served until the end of the service and were honorably discharged. I do not in these classes exclude, except by the word "solely," those who may have deserted for the purpose of procuring an additional bounty. But certainly the word "solely" is sufficiently comprehensive.

All these cases are left subject to the Secretary of War, just where they should be. It is impossible by arbitrary terms to define just such persons as are entitled to this relief. There is no better tribunal to which these may be left than to the Secretary of War and to his Adjutant-General, because they will be reviewed by the Adjutant-General to be submitted for the action of the Secretary of War. So the amendment provides for the relief of seven separate and distinct classes, including the class named by this original bill, and leaves the relief in every instance to the Secretary of War, who shall judge of the propriety of giving it on the evidence which may be submitted to him.

I do not think there is any gentleman here who fears in this regard the present Secretary of War or any other who may succeed him of either of the two political parties. I do not know of what political party the next Secretary of War may be, and so far as this question is concerned I do not care.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana is a substitute for the first section.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I have an amendment to come in at the end of the seventh class in the gentleman's amendment, and also another amendment to be added as an eighth class.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the first amendment to the amendment, proposed by the gentleman from Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the seventh class "and who received no other additional bounty under such second enlistment."

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That makes it conclusive. If the motive for desertion was to obtain the large local bounty offered in 1864, then I think they ought not to have the benefit of this bill.

Mr. STEELE. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Suppose a man on the first enlistment did not get any bounty?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I have used the words "additional bounty" in my amendment.

Mr. STEELE. That would be no additional bounty, because it would be his first bounty.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I can not yield. The classes named in the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana ought all of them to be relieved from the charge of desertion, but beyond that men who left their regiments after the war ended, after the proclamation announcing the war was closed, many of whom said their obligations to the Government were over, having fought gallantly to its close, who in sight of their homes left their commands, should also be relieved.

They left for no other motive than merely to get back home. Such persons, as is well known, left for other motives frequently than the mere object of getting out of the Army. Some of the soldiers left sweethearts behind them and were in a hurry to get home, and I do not blame them. All such classes ought to be relieved from the charge against them. It was not desertion in the strict sense of that term. But that class of men who deserted for the sake of re-enlisting in order to draw the large bounties offered, and especially that class who went in gangs, as we know they did in 1864, under the last call of the President, from city to city, from capital to capital, and from rendezvous to rendezvous, enlisting, drawing the local bounties and deserting the same day, going with their attendants from place to place, ought to be excluded; and we must be more careful in drawing a bill of this character so as not to admit such classes to the benefits which it proposes to grant to worthy men. We must not give a bounty for desertion. That is dishonoring the honorable soldier who did his duty faithfully.

This bill, I think, ought really, then, to be recommitted to the committee, and when the proper time comes I shall make a motion to that effect, in order that it may be thoroughly revised.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him, how can it be possible to find out whether persons who received bounty deserted or not?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It is easy to know it where they received that bounty from the General Government. It is more difficult to ascertain in reference to the local bounties. But I will state to the gentleman from Alabama that in most of the States there are records still accessible, and from which a great deal of information can be obtained upon the subject.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. But did not the bounty-jumpers enlist under different or assumed names?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Yes, as a rule. They enlisted in one regiment under one name, and then deserted and joined another, perhaps under a different name. Or they deserted after enlisting without being assigned to a regiment; and there are cases where men who had deserted after enlisting again enlisted and served to the end of the war under the name of their final enlistment and obtained an honorable discharge under that name. How many would come under the provisions of this bill I do not know. But none of the class that I have mentioned ought to be permitted to enjoy the benefits it confers. There are a few that left their regiments and re-enlisted in other regiments, perhaps intending to desert when they left, but reconsidered the idea and served during the war. I have no objection to relieving them, but I desire to exclude the class of bounty-jumpers totally; they should never be relieved.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] whether in offering this proposed amendment it is designed to be an addition to the bill which was recently passed by the House, the bill No. 4383, that passed the House on the 18th of February?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. That, if the gentleman from Maine will remember, is a bill which covers the point of desertion subsequent to the 1st of May, 1865. As that point is covered in that bill, I do not think it necessary to include it in this amendment.

Mr. DINGLEY. Then I understand this is not a substitute for the bill that was passed?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Certainly not; it is supplementary to the other bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. I now yield to my colleague from Maine.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment in the form of an additional section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that that is not in order now. There is an amendment to the amendment now pending, and an additional section can not be offered until we get through with the bill. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. STEELE. I move to strike out the last word simply to ask my colleague from Indiana in what particular point his amendment differs from House bill 4383, already passed?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Was the interrogatory addressed to me?

Mr. STEELE. It was.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I think if my colleague had listened to the reading of my amendment he would not have needed to ask the question.

Mr. STEELE. It was impossible to hear it in this part of the Hall.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. He would have seen that it differed in many and very material respects from the bill to which he refers. The bill to which he refers is a bill, if I understand it correctly, that simply relieves from the charge of desertion those who left their commands subsequent to the close of the war. It relieves that class only, and my amendment leaves that class solely out. This is one of the differences I think my colleague will understand.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that an amendment to the amendment is now pending, and the gentleman from Indiana is speaking by unanimous consent only. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of class 7 the following:
"Who received no additional bounty under such second enlistment."

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If I am permitted to do so, I am willing to accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana will be considered as modified by the acceptance of the amendment just read.

There was no objection.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, now I move to strike out the last word. The bill No. 4383 does include another class of men. It includes the class that went home—deserted, if you please—and who returned under the President's proclamation and served to the close of the war. It relieves them where they voluntarily returned and provides that the charge of desertion shall be removed, although the provision of the bill was more particularly intended for soldiers who, by their officers' permission, went home to look after suffering families or to bury some relative, or for other causes, and then voluntarily returned and served until they were killed or until the close of the war.

The bill now in the Senate passed by the House covers that class of cases. This bill No. 4383 in addition makes it incumbent on a man to have served at least six months before he shall have any benefit from the provisions of the bill. The bill that is proposed here does not make any limit. If a man had enlisted on the 15th of May, or even on the 21st, and deserted on the 22d day of May, although he might have received a thousand dollars bounty and seen no prior service, he would come under the provisions of the bill under consideration. These men who had seen no service should have gone down to Texas as part of the army of observation, as it was called, and those men who had served through and till the close of the war ought not to have been called to go down there. The bill which passed the House provides they shall have seen six months' service before they can have the benefit of the act.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I move to strike out the last word. I would like the Clerk to read the first clause of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE].

The Clerk read as follows:

First. Men charged with desertion who voluntarily returned within thirty days and served honorably to the end of their term of service.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. The suggestion I make to the gentleman from Indiana is that I think the phraseology should be "who voluntarily returned to their command."

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I think so, too; and I will be glad if the committee will give consent to the insertion of those words.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment will be modified in accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman from Arkansas accepted by the gentleman from Indiana.

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. One other suggestion I desire to submit to the consideration of the committee. It is whether or not the recognition of the principle of allowing a man to desert one branch of the service and go into another branch of the service has not in its very nature a tendency calculated to impair the efficiency of the service. So far as I am concerned, I would not recognize that principle. If you permit men to go from the cavalry into the artillery, from the artillery into the cavalry, from the infantry into the artillery, from the artillery into the infantry, you can not uphold the discipline of the Army. I say we should not recognize that principle. If these gentlemen who are dealing with the cases of their comrades are disposed to recognize it I am willing to go with them; at the same time stating to them I think it is a bad principle and one that ought not to be recognized, and that will result in the end in impairing the efficiency of the service.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. I offer as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no soldier shall be entitled to the benefits of this act against whom more than one charge of desertion shall be found to exist: And provided further, This act shall apply to the Navy as well as the Army.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. I understand the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] has no objection to that being incorporated with his amendment.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I accept the gentleman's amendment. And I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of saying a few words further.

Mr. CURTIN. I wish to understand from the gentleman from Indiana whether he has accepted the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HOBLITZELL]. According to that amendment, if a man is charged with desertion, merely charged with it, he is excluded. I think the gentleman should not accept that amendment.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I ask the Clerk to report again the amendment offered by my friend from Maryland, that I may see whether it is subject to the criticism of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no soldier shall be entitled to the benefits of this act against whom more than one charge of desertion shall be found to exist: And provided further, This act shall apply to the Navy as well as the Army.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I think my friend from Pennsylvania is correct, and I hope the gentleman from Maryland will consent that the phraseology shall be changed.

Mr. CURTIN. I would suggest that in place of the words "found to exist" the language should be "established by sufficient proof."

Mr. KASSON. The word "proved" would cover what the gentleman desires.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. I accept the suggestion and modify the amendment so that it shall read "against whom more than one charge of desertion shall be proved."

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I think I can meet some of the suggestions made by some of the gentlemen about me. This whole bill, if this amendment shall be approved by the committee, submits the questions arising under the several clauses, including persons to whom relief may be given, to the discretion of the Secretary of War. It does not arbitrarily determine that any one person coming within any one of these classes shall have the relief simply because he belongs to the class, but allows the Secretary of War to hear the evidence in the case in whatever shape it may reach him, and determine when he has the whole question before him; first, does the soldier belong to one of the classes contemplated by this legislation; and, secondly, are the surroundings in this particular case such as to commend it to the clemency of the War Department? I think it is left just where it ought to be left. We can not by adopting any arbitrary language give relief to those who ought to have it and exclude from it those who are entitled to it. But when we have fixed a class and authorized a tribunal to determine upon the evidence, then we may hope that those only who merit clemency will receive it.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana whether he thinks this power should be given to the Secretary of War or to the Commissioner of Pensions? I do not know, myself. I only ask the question for information and desire to call the gentleman's attention to it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. By all means it should be given to the War Department.

Mr. KASSON. Where the records all are.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. In the first place, because the War Department has exclusive control of the records; and in the second place because the War Department is presumed to understand something about military law, while the Commissioner of Pensions may be a mere civilian.

Mr. HISCOCK. Let me ask the gentleman this question——

Mr. STEELE. I desire to have read for the information of the Committee of the Whole the bill which has already passed the House, so that gentlemen may fully understand its provisions. That bill provides that all which may be done shall be done in the discretion of the Secretary of War. I ask that the bill may be read as a part of my remarks.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to make this suggestion to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE]. It is very likely that under one of the provisions of this bill the question of desertion will be established by proof outside of the record. I imagine that in most cases the class of persons who enlisted then deserted and re-enlisted were persons who re-enlisted under different names from those under which they originally enlisted. I wish to suggest whether the Pension Bureau would not be more apt to have that kind of evidence than the War Department.

Mr. STEELE. I ask to have read as a part of my remarks the bill which I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4383) to relieve certain soldiers from the charge of desertion.

Be it enacted, &c., That the charge of desertion now standing on the rolls and records in the office of the Adjutant-General of the United States against any soldier who served in the late war in the volunteer service shall be removed in all cases where it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War, from such rolls and records, or from other satisfactory testimony, that any such soldier served faithfully until the expiration of his term of enlistment, or until the 1st day of May, A. D. 1865, or was prevented from completing his term of service by reason of wounds received or disease contracted in the line of duty, but who, by reason of absence from his command at the time the same was mustered out, failed to be mustered out and to receive an honorable discharge.

SEC. 2. That the charge of desertion standing on the rolls and records in the office of the Adjutant-General of the United States against any soldier who served in the late war in the volunteer service shall also be removed in all cases where it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War, from such rolls and records, or from other satisfactory testimony, that such soldier charged with desertion or with absence without leave, and after such charge of desertion or absence without leave voluntarily returned to his command and served in the line of his duty until he was mustered out of the service, and received a certificate of honorable discharge.

SEC. 3. That in all cases where the charge of desertion shall be removed under the provisions of this act from the record of any soldier who has not received a certificate of discharge, it shall be the duty of the Adjutant-General of the United States to issue to such soldier, or, in case of his death, to his heirs or legal representatives, a certificate of discharge.

SEC. 4. That when the charge of desertion shall be removed under the provisions of this act from the record of any soldier, such soldier, or, in case of his death, the heirs or legal representatives of such soldier, shall receive all pay and bounty which may have been withheld on account of such charge of desertion or absence without leave: Provided, however, That this act shall not be so construed as to give to any such soldier as may be entitled to relief under the provisions of this act, or, in case of his death, to the heirs or legal representatives of any such soldier, the right to receive pay and bounty for any period of time during which such soldier was absent from his command without leave of absence: And provided further, That no soldier, nor the heirs or legal representatives of any soldier, who served in the Army a period of less than six months shall be entitled to the benefit of the provisions of this act. That the provisions of this act shall apply also to the soldiers of the war of 1812, Black Hawk war, and the war with Mexico.

SEC. 5. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. PERKINS. I desire to say a word in opposition to the amendment which was offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HOBLITZELL], and to suggest to him that I have prepared an amendment to be offered to the second section of this bill, and for that reason I hope he will not insist upon his amendment to the first section. I ask that the amendment I have prepared may be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to section two the following:

"Provided, That no such soldier shall be entitled to the benefits of this act against whom more than one charge of desertion shall be found to exist, or who obtained more than one bounty, or when it shall appear that the cause of desertion was to obtain a bounty for re-enlistment."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] that the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HOBLITZELL] has been accepted by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] as a portion of his amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. I did not know that the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HOBLITZELL] had been accepted by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE]. I desired to suggest that that amendment to this section be not insisted upon, but that I may be permitted to offer to the second section the amendment which has been read.

I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that it is my judgment that this bill is not open to the criticisms of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] and of other gentlemen who have addressed the committee. It has been suggested that when men deserted from one organization and enlisted in another they re-enlisted under assumed names; that, for instance, a man would enlist under the name of "Smith," and then would desert and re-enlist in another regiment under the name of "Jones." The provisions of this bill would not be applicable to cases of such men. It must be made to appear that a man who enlisted and then deserted re-enlisted in some other organization and served in it and was honorably discharged. If a man enlisted in one regiment as "Smith" and then deserted and re-enlisted in another regiment as "Jones," he could not make it appear that "Smith" had served in another organization until honorably discharged. In order to avail himself of the benefits of this bill he must show that he deserted and served in a subsequent organization until honorably discharged; and he could not show that "Jones" was the identical man who deserted as "Smith."

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I think the gentleman is right.

Mr. PERKINS. The amendment I suggest is that when it is made to appear that a man has deserted more than once, or that he has received more than one bounty, or that he deserted in order that he might secure a bounty for re-enlistment, he can not avail himself of the benefits of this act.

Mr. BOUTELLE. As the proviso offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HOBLITZELL] including the Navy in the operations of this act may be open to the criticism of being somewhat vague, and as the Marine Corps is not technically covered by the term "Navy," I desire to ask him to accept a substitute for his proviso which will cover the ground more fully.

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HOBLITZELL] has been accepted by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], and is included in his amendment.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I will ask that my amendment be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy shall be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered to apply the provisions of this act to all cases of appointed or enlisted men of the Navy and of the Marine Corps who served in the late war.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. I see no objection to that.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I think that is right, and if I can do so I will accept it as a part of my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE], and which has just been read, will be considered a part of the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE]. And the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana as modified will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of the first section after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed, in his discretion and upon satisfactory evidence, to relieve from the charge of desertion the following:

"First. Men charged with desertion who voluntarily returned to their commands within thirty days and served honorably to the end of their term of service.

"Second. Men who deserted from hospital or from furlough given from a hospital while suffering from wounds, injuries, or disease received or contracted in the service and line of duty, and who on recovery returned voluntarily to the service and served honorably until discharged, or who died from such wounds, injury, or disease while so absent, and before the date of muster-out of their regiments.

"Third. Men who returned under the President's proclamation and served honorably until discharged.

"Fourth. Men who left the service without proper authority, and thereby became deserters, for the purpose of relieving their families residing within the enemy's lines from distress or want, and who returned voluntarily and served honorably until discharged.

"Fifth. Men who while awaiting exchange deserted from parol camp, or while on furlough from a parol camp or other authoritative source, and who voluntarily returned and served honorably until discharged.

"Sixth. Men who deserted from a furlough given by any authoritative source, and who during such absence died from wounds inflicted by the enemy or disease contracted in the service before the muster-out of their commands.

"Seventh. Men who deserted or left one command solely for the purpose of joining another and did join another command within thirty days thereafter and served until the end of the war and were honorably discharged, and who received no additional bounty under such second enlistment: Provided, That no soldier shall be entitled to the benefits of this act against whom more than one charge of desertion shall be proved: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy shall be, and hereby is, authorized and empowered to apply the provisions of this act to the cases of appointed or enlisted men of the Navy or Marine Corps who served in the late war."

Mr. HOBLITZELL. I suggest to the gentleman offering this proposition that the word "established" be substituted for the word "proved."

Mr. KASSON. The meaning is the same.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The amendment as just read does not include that class of men who left their regiments after the war was all over.

Mr. CUTCHEON. They are covered by the other bill.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I intentionally omitted that class of men, because they are provided for by another bill which has passed this House and is now in the Senate.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Does not that bill include also several of the classes embraced in the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. No, sir.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I think it does. Besides, I supposed this was probably intended to be a bill which, if passed by the House and the Senate, would be the only act on this subject.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I desire to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole, and especially the gentleman from Indiana who offers this substitute, to what seems to me to be an omission. I listened carefully to the reading, but as I heard the substitute it is not limited to any war or to any particular period, nor is it specified whether it applies to volunteer forces or the regular Army or to both. I would ask that the first part of the substitute be read again, so that we may see whether it is limited in that respect.

Mr. STORM. The bill contains that limitation.

Mr. PETERS. There is no reason why the substitute should be limited to any particular war. If the principle is correct in relation to the last war, it is correct in relation to all our wars.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] by inserting before the classification the words "or who left their regiments after May 1, 1865."

Mr. HISCOCK. It seems to me that in view of the suggestion made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] and other suggestions which have been made on the floor, the wisest policy for this Committee of the Whole is to recommend to the House that the bill be recommitted to the committee which originally reported it, and that when reported back to the House it take its present place upon the Calendar, and stand precisely as it stands to-day, as the unfinished business on the Private Calendar. This course will delay the bill only a week; and the advantage to be gained is that the committee which originally framed the bill will be able to consider it in connection with all these amendments and suggestions, and also to examine it in connection with the bill on the same subject already passed by the House; so that when this bill shall be finally passed we shall not be repeating ourselves in legislation. I move therefore that this bill be reported to the House with a recommendation that it be recommitted, and when reported, with or without amendments, it shall retain its place on the Private Calendar as unfinished business.

Mr. HAMMOND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. This bill is now confessedly on the wrong calendar. Now, I ask whether a motion can be entertained that when the bill comes back to the House it shall again go upon the wrong calendar?

The CHAIRMAN. The chairman of the Committee of the Whole has nothing to do with that question.

Mr. HAMMOND. I wanted to call the attention of the House to that point.

Mr. HOUK. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] will modify his motion so as to require that the Committee on War Claims, to whom he proposes to recommit the bill, shall report it back not later than next private-bill day, and that the bill shall then take its present place on the Calendar, I, as one of the friends of this bill, will vote for his motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from New York is not in order. The only motion which the Chair can entertain is a motion to amend or to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. HISCOCK. Is it not in order to move that the bill be reported to the House with a certain recommendation?

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order.

Mr. BUCKNER. The Committee of the Whole can rise with the view of taking such action in the House.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole House had, according to order, had under consideration the Private Calendar, and particularly the bill (H. R. 3935) to relieve certain soldiers of the late war from the charge of desertion, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I move that the bill, with the amendments pending thereto, be referred to the Committee on War Claims, and that the bill shall retain its place on the Private Calendar without prejudice.

Mr. HAMMOND. I make the point of order this bill does not belong to the Private Calendar, and that if it be recommitted to the Committee on War Claims it must when it is reported back from that committee go to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, to which it properly belongs.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not in the House, but in the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the House can not recommit it to the Committee on War Claims until it has been brought back before the House.

Mr. HISCOCK. Let me make a suggestion: that the gentleman from Wisconsin move the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it be recommitted to the Committee on War Claims, and that when reported back from that committee, with or without amendment, it shall go to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and retain its place as unfinished business.

Mr. STEELE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEELE. Is it in order to move to strike out the enacting clause?

The SPEAKER. The bill is not in the House, and that motion must be made in committee, where the bill is.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I move that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. That is a motion requiring unanimous consent, the House having this morning refused to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the point of order it was improperly referred to that committee.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If the motion should prevail, when the bill comes back from the Committee on War Claims will it be considered in the House, or go to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar?

The SPEAKER. It will be reported back to the House for reference to its appropriate calendar, whatever that may be.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I shall object unless I have unanimous consent to offer an amendment, to be printed in the RECORD and go to the Committee on War Claims with the other amendments.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I object anyhow.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not before the House.

SANTIAGO DE LEON.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 1724) for the relief of Santiago de Leon, reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. What has become of the motion to recommit?

The SPEAKER. The motion to recommit could not be submitted until the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar was discharged from its further consideration.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I understood the gentleman from Wisconsin to make that motion.

The SPEAKER. But it required unanimous consent to submit that motion, and objection was made. The bill is not pending in the House, but in the committee.

The pending question is on the bill (H. R. 1724) for the relief of Santiago de Leon, on which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. HISCOCK. I rise to put a parlimentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HISCOCK. Will the bill for the relief of certain soldiers of the late war from the charge of desertion come up as unfinished business next Friday.

The SPEAKER. It will, of course, when the House resumes the consideration of the business on the Private Calendar.

Mr. HISCOCK. The Committee on War Claims, then, can in the mean time consider the various amendments which have been proposed and be prepared to submit a proposition which may be deemed best to cover the cases which properly ought to be relieved, and in that way the same result will be accomplished as if the bill had been recommitted.

Mr. HOLMAN. It was agreed in Committee of the Whole House that a yea-and-nay vote should be taken on the bill for the relief of Santiago de Leon, the object being to take a test vote as to claims growing out of the late war which were cognizable before the Southern Claims Commission. It was for that reason I demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. BLAND. Pending that, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. KEIFER. That would of course cut off the night session for pension bills, and I hope it will not be done.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Would that motion, if adopted, dispense with the night sessions?

The SPEAKER. It will for this evening.

Mr. ANDERSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ANDERSON. Is a motion to take a recess in order, pending the motion to adjourn, or is it a motion of a higher privilege than the motion to adjourn?

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn takes precedence. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri, that the House do now adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 41, noes 83.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move that the House do now take a recess until half past seven this evening.

Mr. MATSON. I would suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that he modify his motion by moving to take a recess in accordance with the previous order of the House providing for Friday evening sessions.

Mr. McMILLIN. Very well; I will make the motion in that form.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly (at 4.30 p. m.) took a recess until 7.30 p. m.

AFTER THE RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House (at 7 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) resumed its session.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar to consider pension bills under the special order of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of pension bills on the Private Calendar, and the Clerk will report the first bill.

WILLIAM J. LEE.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H.R. 1073) granting a pension to William J. Lee.

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent to pass over that bill informally, allowing it to retain its place on the Calendar.

There was no objection.

ELENOR STOUGH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R.1164) to restore to the pension-roll the name of Elenor Stough; reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions with an amendment.

The bill and report were read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. HORR. Is there any one who knows the circumstances of this case? It seems to me to be a very unusual thing to restore a person, once married and by her own act dropped from the pension-roll, again to the position which she occupied. I do not remember of a single instance within my experience of that kind.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. There have been one or two instances.

Mr. HORR. It seems to me there should be some stronger ground for granting this pension than is set forth in the report. Is there any precedent for it?

Mr. MATSON. I can recall two or three. The daughter of Andrew Johnson, ex-President of the United States, was restored to the pension-rolls by the last Congress under similar circumstances. The widow of Colonel Bass, who was killed in action, is another. Her name was restored under almost precisely similar circumstances. These two instances I recall. I think, however, the precedents so far have been confined to the cases of widows of persons killed in battle.

Mr. HOUK. Mr. Chairman, there are precedents in the action of the Pension Office for this. I know of a case myself where a widow married and was dropped from the rolls, but was subsequently divorced and her name was again taken upon the rolls. The marriage was declared void and she was restored to the pension-roll.

Mr. MATSON. That was probably a case where the marriage was void ab initio; it was not a legal marriage.

Mr. HOUK. The reasons would be the same.

Mr. HORR. Not a bit of it. It seems to me in the case referred to by my friend from Tennessee the marriage must have been absolutely void in the first instance. Now I concede where a case occurs of that character the party whose name was dropped from the roll on account of being married and the marriage was set aside subsequently as illegal ought to be entitled to restoration.

Mr. MATSON. As it is evident, Mr. Chairman, that this bill is going to provoke a discussion, and I should like Judge GEDDES, the author of the bill to be present, and since it was passed over on account of his illness on last Friday evening, I ask now that it be again informally passed over.

Mr. HORR. I hope that will be done, because before I should vote for it I would need to have an explanation of the circumstances that would make it a stronger case than it now appears. I do not think the precedent ought to be set.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the bill will be laid aside informally.

There was no objection.

ROWLAND WARD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4180) granting an increase of pension to Rowland Ward, with an amendment.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Rowland Ward, late a private in Company I, Fourth Regiment New York Heavy Artillery, to $30 per month, in lieu of the pension now received by him, the increase hereby granted to commence from the passage of this act.

The report is as follows:

The case of Rowland Ward is an exceptional one. Probably there is not another similar to it in the history of the late war. The petitioner enlisted in Company E, Fourth New York Heavy Artillery, on the 29th day of September, 1862, for three years, and in a battle at Ream's Station, Va., on the 25th day of August, 1864, was wounded by a bursting shell, which resulted in the total loss of the lower jaw. The disfigurement is most remarkable and repulsive, and can not but excite in the beholder a sentiment of pity. Coupled with the disfigurement, which is permanent, there is the additional disability of not being able to partake of solid food. The power of mastication is destroyed; the muscles employed in swallowing are impaired, and the unfortunate man can not but be rendered uncomfortable and unhappy. In the abstract of testimony presented with the application for an increase of pension the following appears:

J. C. Lyon and J. H. Simon certify "that claimant is unable to perform any manual labor other than light work in his garden, and can not masticate food, but only eat such as is prepared in liquid form, which does not give him sufficient strength for any hard labor."

Examining Surgeon William B. Alley says that Ward had his under jaw nearly all shot away at Ream's Station, Va., August 25, 1864. The wounds are healed with great deformity. He is quite deaf in the right ear. His face, tongue, and throat are partially numb. It is difficult for him to talk and to swallow. He has no power to masticate his food, and is compelled to take it in a liquid form. Tongue is injured so that he can not manage food when in his mouth. He loses flesh continually, and suffers more or less from chronic diarrhea. His disability is equivalent to loss of one hand and one foot, and total of second grade, entitling him to $24 per month, and must continue through life. No more examinations necessary.

L. J. Ames, examining surgeon, says: "The lower jaw has been destroyed and the chin is gone, the face disfigured, the mouth contracted and deformed. There is great difficulty of articulation and utterance, and no power of mastication, with difficulty of digestion, rendering liquid food carefully prepared a necessity to his existence. The disability is permanent in its present degree. While in hospital the patient was operated upon two different times. The part of the face torn off was replaced by taking the skin back from a point on the neck and near the ear and peeling the same to the place near the destroyed point, and lapping the same over the part torn away, but under the tongue, thus forming in the place of an under jaw a skin sack as a receptacle for the tongue and mouth.

The committee are of the opinion that as Ward served faithfully, and has suffered so fearfully, and is incapacitated greatly from earning his living, that his pension should be increased. He is now 66 years old.

The committee recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendment: Strike out the word "thirty," in line 6, and insert "forty."

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARGARET CALLANAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3951) for the relief of Margaret Callanan; reported with an adverse recommendation by the committee.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Margaret Callanan, of Orange, in the county of Essex, in the State of New Jersey, widow of Eugene Callanan, late a private in Company F of the Second Regiment New Jersey Volunteers, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $8 per month, and the allowance provided for minor children under 16 years of age, from and after the 18th day of March, A. D. 1864, the date of the death of her said husband.

The report is as follows:

The petitioner asks a pension on account of the death of her husband, who was a private in Company F, Second Regiment New Jersey Volunteers. The Pension Office rejects her claim because the disease of which he died did not originate in the service and line of duty.

It seems the soldier obtained a furlough on the 10th day of February, 1864, for thirty-five days, and while at home, on the 18th of March, 1864, died of typhoid pneumonia. The Surgeon-General can give no evidence in the case, and the claimant swears she can not furnish any evidence as to the origin of the disease.

Dr. Lyman M. Crane testifies he was first called to visit the soldier professionally March 12, 1864, and found him very ill with inflammation of the lungs, and that he continued to suffer from said disease without abatement until he died. Affiant thinks it probable the said disease was contracted in the service and prior to the date of granting the furlough. The doctor's conclusion is not positive and stands alone and unsupported.

The committee are of the opinion that the ground for granting a pension is very slight, and therefore report adversely and recommend that the bill do not pass.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection this bill will be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be laid upon the table.

Mr. FIEDLER. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. FIEDLER. Mr. Chairman, this bill was introduced by myself, with the belief that while this applicant is not perhaps technically or under a strict construction of the law entitled to a pension, still, as the report shows, I think that his widow should be entitled to relief by Congress under the peculiar circumstances of the case. If I understand the facts, the committee, through the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAGLEY] who made the report, reported it adversely on the ground that the furlough expired before his death. He had received a furlough for thirty-five days, which would have expired on the 15th of March. He died on the 18th, which shows that he was not probably in a condition to leave home and report for duty. He was examined on the 12th of March, before the furlough expired, and was found to be very ill with inflammation of the lungs. He died in consequence of that sickness, and the medical testimony is to the effect that the disease was probably contracted in the service.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. But he was not in the service at the time.

Mr. FIEDLER. He was not in active service but he was on furlough.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Still the disability was not incurred in the service or in the line of duty.

Mr. MATSON. The law provides that unless the soldier is away on sick leave or on veteran furlough he would not be entitled to a pension for any injury contracted during its existence. Now this was the ordinary furlough.

Mr. FIEDLER. I understand that is the reason that the Pension Department could not grant the relief, and hence the application to Congress.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. Will the gentleman from New Jersey yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FIEDLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. I understand from the reading of the report the difficulty is in locating the origin of the disease as to the point of time, whether the disease originated while this soldier was in active service or whether it originated after he received the furlough. The slight testimony based on the statement of the physician was not thought sufficient to justify a favorable report.

Mr. FIEDLER. The physician could not certify the disease originated in the service, and for that reason I understand the Pension Department could not grant a pension under the law. The widow comes to Congress and appeals for a special act in her favor. It is a matter of charity, as I think, although I do not appeal on the ground of charity alone, but I think many cases are passed favorably by the House which are no more deserving than this one. I do not desire to oppose the committee. I believe I have the sympathy of the committee with me. They have looked through the whole evidence. I have no evidence before me beyond what is contained in the report. I did present a petition in this case at one time, but I can not now lay my hand on it. My ground for asking favorable action in this case is that the soldier was taken sick while on furlough, and he was then virtually on duty. Whether he caught the cold which started this disease before he left the service does not clearly appear. The physician says it is probable he did, but he can not swear positively it was so.

Mr. BAGLEY. I examined this case and made the report; and at the suggestion of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FIEDLER] I had the case placed on the Calendar as an adverse report.

The principle involved in this case is whether a pension should be granted when a soldier died while on furlough and not in the line of duty. It seems he was perfectly well when he went home. He contracted the disease when at home and died there. I do not wish to antagonize the gentleman from New Jersey in his case. I am perfectly willing the House should take it into consideration. I only wish to say that is the point involved. He was on furlough, contracted his disease while on furlough at home, and died there.

Mr. FIEDLER. I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over informally for the present. I may be in a condition hereafter to submit more evidence to the committee in regard to it.

There being no objection, the bill was passed over informally.

MARCUS A. HAMILTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2407) for the relief of Marcus A. Hamilton, reported adversely from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Marcus A. Hamilton, formerly of Company K, First Regiment New Jersey Cavalry Volunteers.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2407) for the relief of Marcus A. Hamilton, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to submit the following report:

That the case is still pending in the Pension Office, a request having been made for additional evidence. Under the circumstances the committee feel that the case has not arrived at that stage where it should be considered by Congress, and therefore ask to be discharged from its consideration.

Mr. BAGLEY. I will state to the committee that there was an error in putting this report on the Calendar. The bill should have been laid on the table. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported back to the House with the adverse report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

HONORA KELLEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1056) granting a pension to Honora Kelley.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Honora Kelley, widow of James Kelley, late a sergeant of Company K, Fifth United States Cavalry, to date from the death of the soldier.

The bill was reported with the following amendments:

In line 4, after the word "pension-roll," insert "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

In line 7, after the word "cavalry," strike out the words "to date from the death of the soldier."

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1056) granting a pension to Honora Kelley, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to submit the following report:

As shown by the papers from the Pension Office, Honora Kelley is the widow of James Kelley, who enlisted in the United States Army January, 1854, and served continuously until December 6, 1878, when discharged from Company K, Fifth United States Cavalry. He received a severe wound of abdomen in a fight with Indians May 17, 1858. The only treatment shown during his entire service, except for this wound was in 1869 for epistaxis. Major Malon certifies that the soldier was under his command for ten years, and during that period had repeated violent nose-bleedings, threatening his life, and it was the current belief that these bleedings were the result of the wound received in an engagement with Indians.

The soldier died February 23, 1879, of pneumonia, at the Shoshone and Bannock Indian agency. The attending physician, Assistant Surgeon Grimes, certifies that on the 23d of February, 1879, he was called upon to attend Kelley, and found him in the last stage of pneumonia. He died on the same day, and it is his belief that the disease would not have terminated fatally had not Kelley been broken down and worn out by the vicissitudes of long service in the Army.

Lieutenant Thomas states that the soldier was discharged December 6, 1878. Authority was obtained for his re-enlistment from the Adjutant-General of the Army. But objections were raised by the commanding officer of the post to the residence of Kelley's family upon the reserve or about the post. His re-enlistment was postponed till he could make suitable arrangements for his family. While so doing he contracted the disease of which he died, and which terminated fatally from exposure incident to long frontier service.

Captain Woodson also certifies that during last year's service the soldier appeared much shaken and broken down, evidently the result of long frontier service.

This committee, in view of the length of service of this soldier, and the further fact that he was at the time of his death to all intents and purposes a soldier of the United States Army, recommend the passage of the bill with amendments as follows: Insert after the words "pension-roll," in line 4, the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws," and strike out all after the word "cavalry" in line 6.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

PATRICK HORAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 283) granting a pension to Patrick Horan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Patrick Horan, late a teamster in the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army, with the same rate of pension to which a private soldier would be entitled for like disabilities.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 283) granting a pension to Patrick Horan, having had the same under consideration, would submit the following report:

The committee, after an examination of the proofs in this case, adopt the report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the Forty-seventh Congress, and make said report their own, as follows:

"[House Report No. 1551, Forty-seventh Congress, first session.]

"The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6501) granting a pension to Patrick Horan, having had the same under consideration, would submit the following report:

"The petitioner, Patrick Horan, of Joliet, Ill., was enrolled on or about September 15, 1861, as a teamster of the Quartermaster's Department, by Capt. G. E. D. Diamond, at Saint Louis, Mo. He was never discharged, but paid last at Fort Riley, Kans., and sent back to Saint Louis on the 28th of November, 1866.

"While serving as a teamster he was taken prisoner of war at the battle of Poison Springs, and was confined at Camp Ford, Tyler, Tex., from about April, 1864, to about the middle of February, 1865. While a prisoner he was without shelter or covering of any kind, and in June, 1864, was exposed to a rain-storm of fourteen days' duration. During his confinement he dug a hole in the ground, in which he slept. In consequence of his exposure and suffering he was stricken with paralysis, from which disease he has been suffering to the present time.

"His statement as to his imprisonment, exposure, and incurrence of paralysis in rebel prisons is corroborated by the testimony of Henry B. Clark, himself an inmate of said prisons, and by the testimony of John B. Arnold, of the Chicago Mercantile Battery.

"The evidence also shows that prior to and on his arrival at said prison he was in sound health. The testimony of neighbors, of Joliet, Ill., shows that upon his return to Joliet, after the war, he was afflicted with paralysis, which has continued to the present time, making him completely unable to perform any physical labor.

"Dr. W. Dougall, of Will County, Illinois, states that since 1874 petitioner has been under his treatment; that he has carefully studied his case; that he is suffering from 'locomotor ataxia,' caused by exposure and sleeping upon damp ground; that it gradually grows worse; is incurable, and will soon render him entirely helpless. His claim was rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that petitioner was not in the military service of the United States, and therefore does not come under the general provisions of the pension law; but the Pension Bureau is of opinion that his claim is a meritorious one and should be allowed by 'special act;' and that if such special act is granted the pension should commence from the date of its passage, at such rate as the claimant, upon examination, may be found to be entitled to.

"Your committee are of opinion that the claimant is entitled to the relief he seeks, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill."

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I think that is going a little further than we usually do. This is going to the civil list and putting a man on the pension-roll who was not in the military service. I shall object to the passage of this bill. I think it had better be passed over without action.

Mr. CULLEN. It seems to me if the gentleman from Alabama understood this case he would withdraw his objection. If ever there was a meritorious case this is one. If the gentleman insists on his objection, I do not propose to waste the time of the committee; but I want to state the case very briefly as I know it to be from personal observation.

It is true that, technically speaking, Patrick Horan was not a soldier. He enlisted as a teamster in the Quartermaster's Department. The service was at all events a perilous one, and at times more dangerous than that of the man who carried a musket. Streams were to be forded and dangerous bridges crossed, and the property of the Government defended often with the lives of the teamsters. This man was a part of the Army and under military discipline. He dare not desert his post in the face of the enemy. As a citizen he would have been entitled to the protection of the Government, but he was in the Army and taken a prisoner of war. He was treated as a prisoner of war, treated as a soldier and suffered as such. The report just read is but a feeble presentation of his suffering. Without proper food, with but little clothing, and no blanket for covering, exposed to a pitiless storm of two weeks' duration, he was compelled to burrow in the wet ground to prolong his miserable life. For this cruel suffering I propose to arraign no one. Doubtless brave men on the other side suffered privations but little less severe. With scanty supplies, if any suffered for lack of food and shelter it would be the prisoner. It was but the fortune of war. In whatever form this man enlisted he suffered as a soldier, with soldiers.

He was in the service of the Government when it was impotent to give him protection, and for that Government he sacrificed his health and became a physical wreck. His life for nearly twenty years has been one of agony and sore distress. The paralysis which then seized him holds him still in its grip of death and is hurrying him with rapid strides toward the grave. No man can look upon him as he endeavors to move on the street, with curved spine, bowed head, and leaning on his crutches as he vainly tries to drag his paralyzed limbs along, without a heartache. The young and strong man of twenty years ago is older than the man of three-score and ten and much more helpless.

The Pension Office rejected this claim because technically Horan was not enlisted as a soldier, but certify that it is a case of merit and recommend it for Congressional action. It is an exceptional case in every aspect. The manner in which the disability occurred and its intensity are peculiar. In equity this man should have drawn a pension for the last nineteen years. His substance has long since been wasted and he subsists on the charity of kind neighbors. His case is one that properly comes within the purview of Congress; and the Pension Office say it has merits. The bill was thoroughly discussed in committee, and in Committee of the Whole in the Forty-seventh Congress, and passed in the House. It was then, as it must now, be considered an exceptional case. Probably not another like it can be produced.

Congress has heretofore passed bills to pension nurses, the sisters of deceased soldiers, and others not strictly of a pensionable class, and I think in most of cases, if not all, they did right. They were exceptional cases, as is this. Because it is exceptional and extreme I am in favor of the passage of this bill. Horan is not of my party. I only know him by sight; that was enough for me when I knew he came to his pitiable estate while serving his country. The Congress that refuses him a pension I fear will not stand high in the estimation of a thousand men who see him from time to time and do not fully appreciate a strict construction of the pension laws in such a case while great liberality of construction is given in others. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside and reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. HORR. I hope the Chair will take a vote on the question of laying aside this bill to be reported favorably to the House, and I think if that vote shall be comparatively unanimous my friend from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] will not insist upon his objection. If there ever was a case where a teamster should be allowed the same rate of pension that a soldier would get, this is such a case.

Mr. COSGROVE. I would inquire if teamsters employed in the capacity in which this man was employed were not considered a part of the Army?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Sometimes teamsters were detailed from those who were regularly enlisted in the service, and at other times they were hired and were but civil employés.

Mr. COSGROVE. Were their names carried upon the rolls?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Not upon the muster-rolls, but upon the quartermaster or commissary pay-roll.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CULLEN], that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The question was taken by a viva voce vote, and the chairman announced that the ayes had it.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama (in his seat). I call for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not recognize a call for a division unless the gentleman making it rises in his place.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama (rising). I demand a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes 1.

So (no further count being called for) the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

MARY G. HAWK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 284) for the relief of Mary G. Hawk.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mary G. Hawk, widow of Robert M. A. Hawk, deceased, late a captain and brevet major in the Ninety-second Regiment Illinois Volunteers, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws.

The report (made by Mr. CULLEN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 284) for the relief of Mary G. Hawk, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

After an examination of the papers on file in the Pension Office, your committee would adopt the report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions in the Forty-seventh Congress and make it their own, as follows:

"[House Report No. 1901, Forty-seventh Congress, first session.]

"The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7066) for the relief of Mary G. Hawk, has had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

"The claimant is the widow of Robert M. A. Hawk, who served as captain of Company C, Ninety-second Illinois Volunteers, from March 23, 1863, until June 21, 1865, when mustered out. On the 12th of April, 1865, while in action at or near Raleigh, N. C., he received a gunshot wound, which necessitated the amputation of the right leg at lower third of thigh. For this disability he was pensioned at $20 per month from date of discharge, which rate was subsequently increased to $24. He died in the city of Washington, June 29, 1882, of apoplexy. The widow filed a claim for pension under the general laws, alleging that the death cause was the direct result of the injury received in the military service. In support of her allegation she has filed the following evidence:

"The affidavit of Clinton Helm, late surgeon of the Ninety-second Illinois Volunteers: Affiant testifies that Captain Hawk received a gunshot wound April 12, 1865, the ball entering about three inches above the right trochanter, and passing out in the mesial line about three inches below the umbilicus, severing the right external iliac artery, and consequently cutting off the circulation from the leg. Affiant amputated the leg at its lower third. Necrosis of the lower end of the femur followed, and after some years a part of the bone was removed. The limb continued to discharge for about ten years after the amputation before it finally healed. The officer always suffered from want of exercise on account of the loss of the leg, and in consequence thereof grew fleshy. Hawk, prior to the injury, was a very active, robust man, and being forced to change to an indoor, sedentary life, failed to get exercise sufficient to keep up a proper circulation of the blood, which, in the opinion of the affiant, tended to produce the apoplectic condition said to have caused death.

"From the affidavit of Dr. D. M. Greeley it appears that the affiant was Captain Hawk's family physician during the last five or six years of his life. Knew that he was a sound man before he enlisted, and that after discharge his health was not good. Suffered from necrosis of the bone at the lower end of the stump for several years after the amputation. Affiant is of opinion that by reason of the great change in the circulation by the loss of limb the heart became affected, as is often the case, in particular when so important an artery as the external iliac has been severed. Statistics show that in a majority of cases of apoplexy, either hypertrophy, dilatations, or valvular disease of the heart exists. In Captain Hawk's case the pulse as well as the action of the heart was variable. Digestion was imperfect. The headache, of which he often complained, in connection with the variable pulse, may be accepted as sure symptoms of cardiac disease. The manner in which any of the conditions of the heart spoken of affects the circulation of the brain, producing apoplexy or rupture of the blood-vessels of the brain, is sufficiently intelligible, and quite well understood by all medical men.

"Dr. Thomas Winston also swears that it is his opinion that the injury received in service was the cause of Captain Hawk's death. Dr. Nelson Rinedollar testifies to a well and personal acquaintance with the officer prior and since the war. He describes fully the injury to the leg, and fully agrees with the physicians that had Captain Hawk been spared his limb and afforded the privilege of proper exercise, apoplexy would not have occurred in his case.

"Dr. Henry Shimer testifies to a long acquaintance with Captain Hawk and to his physical condition after the amputation of the leg. From his own personal knowledge of the case he is clearly of opinion that the destruction of the right external iliac artery, together with the poisoned condition of the blood, and the inability to take proper exercise, were important factors in producing that degeneration of the arteries of the brain which ultimately gave way, thus producing the apoplectic attack.

"Dr. B. T. Buckley swears that he believes the death of Captain Hawk to have been caused by apoplexy originating in degeneration of the arteries resulting from a sedentary and inactive mode of life, and from circulatory and blood changes induced by a wound of the external iliac artery, and consequent gangrene, necrosis, and amputation of the leg twice repeated.

"The widow's claim has been rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that the fatal disease is not due to causes which had their origin in the service.

"After careful consideration of all the evidence presented in the case the committee is of opinion that the injury received by Captain Hawk in the military service of the United States, was, to say the least, an important factor in the officer's death day, and therefore reports favorably on the bill, and asks that it pass, amended, however, by striking out, in line 7, all after the word 'volunteers.'"

Your committee would therefore recommend the passage of the bill (H. R. 284) placing the name of Mary G. Hawk on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ISAAC DEMARANVILLE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4059) granting a pension to Isaac Demaranville.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Isaac Demaranville, late a private in Company E, Ninety-third Illinois Volunteers.

The report (made by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4059) granting a pension to Isaac Demaranville, submit the following report:

We find that Isaac Demaranville enlisted August 13, 1862, in the Ninety-third Illinois Volunteers. He makes affidavit that at the battle of Missionary Ridge, November 25, 1863, he received a gunshot wound in the left leg, and was taken prisoner and confined at Belle Island, and then taken to Andersonville prison, where he remained until February 26, 1865, when he was paroled. He claims that while in prison at Andersonville he received a severe injury to the back by slipping while carrying a pine log. The case was rejected by the Pension Office because he could not furnish evidence of his comrades. The report of the Adjutant-General is that he was missing in an action at Tunnel Hill, in front of Chickamauga, Ga., November 25, 1863. His regiment was in action at that place on that date. His name was dropped from subsequent muster-rolls until those for March and April, 1865, take his name up, with similar remarks to that stated above. He was mustered out at Springfield, Ill., June 24, 1865, to date May 29, 1865. Prisoner-of-war records show him captured at Missionary Ridge, Ga., November 25, 1863, paroled at N. E. Ferry, N. C., February 26, 1865. Certificate of examining surgeon, January 21, 1878, gives description of the wound, and also states that he can not fully satisfy himself as to origin of injury to the back. Your committee would respectfully submit that fifteen months' incarceration in that prison-pen at Andersonville ought to exempt him from the requirement to furnish evidence, and would, therefore, recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I would like to have the gentleman who reports this bill to the House make some explanation of it. It seems, according to the language of the report, that the committee came to the conclusion that this man was entitled to a pension because he was confined in Andersonville prison for fifteen months.

I am not one of those who believe that men who were captured during the war are more meritorious than those who were not. I do not pretend to say that every man who was captured was captured because of cowardice, for many of them were brave and good men, and this man may have been one. But we all know that many men upon both sides were captured through cowardice, because they laid down, did not try to get out of the way, and were taken prisoners.

Simply because a man was captured and made a prisoner of war is no evidence that he has a better case or was a more meritorious soldier than the man who was not captured. Unless there is some better reason presented why he should have a pension than that this man was captured and kept in prison for fifteen months I shall oppose the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I am somewhat surprised at the position taken by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT]. I do not see how the report can be construed as meaning that this pension should be granted because the man was a prisoner. The report states very explicitly that he received a gunshot wound in the left leg at the battle of Missionary Ridge; that he was taken prisoner there, and that while confined in prison he sustained a very severe injury to his back.

The case was rejected by the Pension Office because the man was unable to prove by any comrade the wound he had received at Missionary Ridge or the injury he sustained while in prison. The report simply states that in the opinion of the committee fifteen months' incarceration in the prison-pen at Andersonville ought to exempt the man from the requirement to prove by his comrades that he was wounded. The injury is unquestioned and the surgeon describes it fully, but the man can not prove where he received the injury, simply because he was taken prisoner and separated from his comrades and was unable to procure their evidence. I have examined very carefully the papers in this case.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Was this man captured because of the wound he received in battle?

Mr. MORRILL. Yes; a wound received in battle at Missionary Ridge.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. And he was captured at Missionary Ridge?

Mr. MORRILL. He was captured there after he was wounded.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. MORRILL. I thank the gentleman; I knew he would withdraw it after he understood the case.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman. It is stated in this report that the committee were satisfied that the facts were fully proven. So far as I am able to gather from the report the only evidence which was submitted to the Pension Office and to the committee of this House was the affidavit of the man himself. The committee in its conclusions do not say that they believe that affidavit of the man himself is sufficient proof of the fact, but they say that because he was fifteen months in the Andersonville prison he should be relieved from the necessity of furnishing any additional testimony as to the facts with reference to his case.

Now, I wish to ask the gentleman whether or not the committee believed the facts were sufficiently proven before the committee to show that this man is entitled to this pension.

Mr. MORRILL. In reply to the gentleman, I will say that there was considerable evidence before the committee, and it all went to sustain the statement of the applicant. There was nothing against his application but the absence of evidence proving that the injury which he states he received while in prison was so received. It is proved that he was a sound man when he went into the service, and that when he came out of prison he had in some manner received this injury; but it could not by any possibility be proved how and where this injury was received, because by reason of his imprisonment he was separated from his comrades.

Mr. HORR. Does not the report of the examining surgeon describe this injury?

Mr. MORRILL. It describes the gunshot wound, and also speaks of this other injury.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will ask the gentleman further whether this man's application was not rejected at the Pension Office because he was unable to furnish any evidence except his own affidavit that this hurt in the back was received while he was incarcerated in Andersonville prison?

Mr. MORRILL. As stated in the report which I have submitted in this case, this man's application was rejected at the Pension Office because he could not furnish the evidence of his comrades as to this injury in the back. But he was sound when he entered the service, and was suffering from this injury when he came out.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Then the committee had no new evidence—no evidence except that which had been submitted to the Pension Office?

Mr. MORRILL. That is all.

Mr. BLANCHARD. With reference to this point I wish to read the concluding lines of the report.

> Your committee would respectfully submit that fifteen months' incarceration in that prison-pen at Andersonville ought to exempt him from the requirement to furnish further evidence, and they would, therefore, recommend the passage of the bill.

Now, as I understand, in the opinion of the committee the fact that this man was incarcerated in Andersonville prison should be accepted as exempting him from the necessity of submitting evidence that the injury to his back was incurred during his confinement in Andersonville prison.

Mr. MORRILL. I will repeat the statement I have already made, and I will try to make it just as plain as the English language can make it. The proof was that this man was sound when he went into the service. The report of the Adjutant-General says that he was missing in the action at Tunnel Hill in front of Chickamauga. The applicant states that he received a gunshot wound in the leg. When he came out of prison, after fifteen months' confinement, he shows this wound and the other injury. The United States examining surgeon describes the wound and the injury, but the man is unable to prove by any of his comrades when or how he received this injury. The report simply states that in view of his having suffered fifteen months' confinement in prison, he ought not to be required to prove that injury by the evidence of comrades; that he ought to be exempted from such requirement in view of the fact that it is utterly impossible for him to get that proof, because he was at the time separated from his comrades.

Mr. COSGROVE. Is this soldier now disabled in any way in consequence of any wound that he received in the service?

Mr. MORRILL. At the present time?

Mr. COSGROVE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRILL. The report of the surgeon states that he is.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. Does the report of the surgeon show that there was a gunshot wound or a wound inflicted by a shell?

Mr. MORRILL. A gunshot wound clearly.

Mr. HOUK. Will my colleague on the committee [Mr. MORRILL] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MORRILL. With pleasure.

Mr. HOUK. As I understand this question, Mr. Chairman, the proof of the existence of this wound is conclusive. The soldier was sound when he went into the service. It is proved that he was taken prisoner and confined at Andersonville for fifteen months. As I understand the report of the committee it is submitted that in view of his confinement in prison, away from his comrades, so that there are no witnesses whom he can produce to show what took place there, he should be exempted from the necessity of producing such proof. This, as I understand, is stated in the report as a reason why he could not comply with the requirement of the Pension Office. It is not held that he should receive a pension because of his imprisonment, but it is simply stated that as this man by being taken prisoner was separated from his comrades, he should not be required to produce evidence which under the circumstances it must be impossible for him to procure. All the circumstances show a reasonable certainty that the injury was received at the time and in the manner stated by the applicant.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

MARY ALLEN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2100) granting a pension to Mary Allen.

The bill was read, as follows:

> Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary Allen, widow of John Allen, late a private in Company H, Seventy-second Regiment Missouri Enrolled Militia.

The report was read, as follows:

> Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2100) granting a pension to Mary Allen, reported as follows:
> Mary Allen is the widow of John Allen, who enlisted August 12, 1862, in the Seventy-second Regiment Missouri Enrolled Militia, and died in service from fever December 23, 1863. Application for pension was made in 1878, but rejected by the Pension Department under paragraph 3, section 4693, which provides "that no claim of a State militiaman or non-enlisted person on account of disability, &c., * * * shall be valid unless prosecuted to a successful issue prior to July 4, 1874." The evidence shows that John Allen died of disease incurred in the service during his term of enlistment.
> We recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. When was the death of this soldier? Did it take place in the service or subsequently?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I understand the report to say that he died in the service.

Mr. PERKINS. He died in the service.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Was this regiment serving in the United States service?

Mr. MORRILL. It was under United States authority.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is all I wish to know.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HIRAM M. HOWARD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 501) for the relief of Hiram M. Howard, of Richland, Kans.

The bill was read, as follows:

> Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Hiram M. Howard, late a private in Company I, Second Regiment Kansas Volunteer Militia, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report was read, as follows:

> Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 501) for the relief of Hiram M. Howard, of Richland, Kans., reported as follows:
> We find that Hiram M. Howard was enrolled September 5, 1863, in the Kansas State militia. That on the 10th of October, 1864, he was mustered into service in Company I, Second Regiment Volunteer Militia, and that the regiment was immediately ordered into Missouri to repel the Price raid, which then threatened Eastern Kansas. That on the 22d of October, 1864, while in battle at Big Blue, Jackson County, Missouri, he received a severe wound, the ball passing through the left arm and lodging in his left lung. He fell to the ground insensible, and while in this condition was run over, and several of his ribs were severely fractured.
> In March, 1875, claimant made application for a pension, but was debarred under the third paragraph of section 4693, which provides that pension claims of militiamen must be proved prior to July 4, 1874. Claimant makes affidavit that he did not know of the existence of any statute of limitation. That for a number of years after he was wounded he was able to practice his profession as a physician and thus support his family. That he also had some property, which relieved him of the necessity of applying for a pension. That he is now completely broken down in health and unable to support his family. Technically, the Pension Department can not grant him a pension; Congress can, and it is not presumed that they will refuse to do so because he had the manliness to refuse to ask aid while he was able to provide a livelihood for himself and family. Now, enfeebled and broken down from the effects of his wounds, he is compelled to call for help on that Government that he so gallantly defended when it needed the service of all its brave and loyal sons. The testimony in the case is so full and clear as to leave no doubt that the facts are as stated in this report. The committee therefore recommend the passage of this bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

FRANCES E. HENDRICKS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2059) to increase the pension of Frances E. Hendricks, reported adversely.

Mr. MORRILL. This is an adverse report. I move it be passed over for the present and retain its place on the Calendar.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was passed over.

N. C. RIDENOUR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5443) for the relief of N. C. Ridenour.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, directed to place the name of N. C. Ridenour, late second lieutenant of Company F, Twenty-third Regiment of Iowa Volunteer Infantry, on the pension-roll as such second lieutenant, the Secretary of the Interior to rate him in accordance with such rank; the increase of pension herein authorized to commence upon the passage of this act and be in lieu of all other pensions.

The report was read, as follows:

Mr. HOLMES, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2000) for the relief of Newton C. Ridenour, second lieutenant Company F, Twenty-third Iowa Volunteer Infantry, reported as follows:

A bill for the relief of this claimant was introduced in the Forty-seventh Congress and reported favorably by the Committee on Invalid Pensions (H. R. 6523), being a substitute for the original bill (H. R. 310), same session, and passed the House.

The following is the report of the Invalid Pension Committee in regard to said bill in the Forty-seventh Congress, which is adopted and made a part of this report:

"Newton C. Ridenour, late second lieutenant Company F, Twenty-third Iowa Volunteer Infantry, was granted a pension July 26, 1880, at the rate of $3 per month, the certificate being No. 164978. Prior to and until June 29, 1863, said Ridenour was serving with his regiment in the field in the campaign against Vicksburg as an orderly sergeant. On June 29, 1863, was commissioned second lieutenant, for which place he was recommended early in June, said commission being dated June 29, 1863.

"About the 5th day of July, 1863, by order of the officer commanding the regiment, said Ridenour took command of Company F, and continued in command until October 5, 1864, when he was assigned to staff duty. Said Ridenour was discharged as an enlisted man as of the date of June 29, 1863, and he was accepted and mustered in as second lieutenant to take effect July 1, 1863. Immediately after the surrender of Vicksburg said Ridenour, in charge of said company, in July, 1863, marched from said city to Jackson, Miss. During said march said claimant was attacked with varicocele, and was at times rendered thereby unable to march, and was compelled to resort to the ambulance. When he entered the service he was a strong, healthy man. Previously to said month of July, 1863, or in the latter part of June of that year, the petitioner was somewhat unwell, although the precise nature of his ailment is unknown, and he was not then aware that it was the varicocele for which he was afterward pensioned. It is not certain that said disease had its inception before July, 1863. But if that was the fact, it is apparent and uncontradicted that the principal development, growth, and establishment of the disease occurred after the commencement of the march from Vicksburg to Jackson. It is shown by medical evidence that the disability of said Ridenour is permanent and incurable, and that such disability incapacitates said Ridenour from performing manual labor.

"This committee is of the opinion that under the existing circumstances of the case as hereinbefore stated said Ridenour should be regarded as a second lieutenant at the time of the occurrence of the disability for which pension has been granted and his rating should be increased accordingly.

"This committee therefore recommend the passage of a substitute bill, which is herewith submitted."

Your committee would recommend the substitution of the accompanying bill in lieu of the bill (H. R. 2000) Forty-eighth Congress, and that the claimant be granted a pension as provided in said substituted bill.

All of which is herewith submitted.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I should like to have some explanation of this case. If I comprehend the report from its reading, this claimant was pensioned in the rank he held at the time he incurred the disability. This proposition is to increase the pension by increasing the rank, or by assuming at the time he held a commission and was entitled to be regarded as a second lieutenant. I do not believe in increasing a pension in that way. If he was in fact a second lieutenant at the time the disease was incurred, the Pension Office by inquiring of the War Department can ascertain whether it was so or not.

I make this statement because this is not an isolated case by any means. There are hundreds of them, and I might say thousands of them, where soldiers were injured at a time when they held commissions or rank beyond that which they actually had. It was necessary they should have a command sufficiently large to entitle them to be mustered; and besides they must have discharged the duties of the higher rank. They must have been mustered into the service under the higher commission. If it be true in this case this disability was incurred at the time this soldier held the rank by which his pension was rated, I do not think we should interfere to increase his rank. It would be better to muster him into the regular Army and put him on the retired-list.

Mr. HOLMES. I desire to say in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana that the proof is in some respects conflicting. This man, as shown by the evidence of record, on June 29, 1863, was commissioned as a second lieutenant and mustered in as such July 1.

Now, it seems that his disability, by the preponderance of evidence in this case, arose after he was acting as a commissioned officer, but perhaps before he was mustered in, certainly, however, while he was acting as a first lieutenant. I think the preponderance of evidence clearly shows that, and the committee so found when they reported the bill, after a careful examination of the testimony.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Will the gentleman allow me? What are the allegations of the declaration in the Pension Office? When does the claimant allege, in his original application, the incurrence of the disability?

Mr. HOLMES. If I recollect aright, he claims to have incurred it on this very march, as stated here in this report.

Mr. HORR. When was that?

Mr. HOLMES. That was on the march from Vicksburg to Jackson, Miss., July, 1863.

Mr. STRUBLE. He started out on July 5 on that march. I know the fact, for I was there.

Mr. HOLMES. Yes, sir; he was commissioned as a first lieutenant on the 1st of July, or rather he was mustered in to take effect on that date, and started on this march on the 5th.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. When was he commissioned?

Mr. HOLMES. To date from the 1st of July, 1863.

Mr. HORR. When was he mustered?

Mr. HOLMES. He was mustered in to date from the 1st of July, although he was mustered in a few days after the receipt of his commission.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. What year was that?

Mr. HOLMES. In 1863.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. That was the rule of the Department at that time.

Mr. HOLMES. I understand that all pensions heretofore have been granted on that basis.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. I will state, Mr. Chairman, that it was the rule of the War Department to muster all officers in the field from the date of their commissions, and they took rank from the date of their commissions. It was afterward, in 1863, in the latter part of the year, that this rule was changed, and officers were not allowed to take rank in the Army until they were mustered.

Mr. HOLMES. I understand that to be the rule that applied to this case. I looked it up quite thoroughly at the time, and all of these facts are borne out by the record. The disability was incurred, according to the opinion of the committee, after he had been acting as an officer. The medical reports are different in this latter particular, the later reports increasing the disability. This pension is based upon the later reports. We had no doubt in our own minds that the disability was incurred in the service while he was acting as a first lieutenant, and that he was entitled to be rated as of that rank.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, this applicant, as shown by the report, was mustered out as an enlisted man to date from the 29th of June, 1863, at which date he was commissioned as a second lieutenant. He was not therefore an enlisted man at the time of the incurrence of the disease. He was placed in command of one of the companies of his regiment as a lieutenant by order of the officer commanding the regiment. If he was not mustered in until a later date it was not his fault. Immediately after he was commissioned he was placed in command of the company and they started out on an important expedition. They were in the field in active service, and there was no opportunity for Lieutenant Ridenour's being mustered, and that is the reason that this pension was not granted by the Department. But not only is he entitled to this rank and to this pension, but there is great injustice done him by this report. He should have this pension, to date from the incurrence of the disease; and I desire to move to strike out from the ninth line of the bill the words, "the passage of this act," and insert the words, "the incurrence of his disease."

There is nothing but simple justice in this. He was not an enlisted man when that disease was incurred. He was an officer. He was serving as such and was recognized as such, and because he was not formally mustered as such was through no fault of his own, and he should not be the sufferer by it.

Mr. MATSON. I am in favor of the passage of this bill, but I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa. It has been the uniform practice, and it is hardly necessary I should remind the House of the fact, not to grant arrears in special-act cases. The proposition made by the gentleman from Iowa implies the rerating of this pension from the date of the disability; and our committee have uniformly refused that in all other cases, and I think it ought not to be done in this.

So far as the case is concerned, I think the committee have decided fairly upon the probabilities.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If the gentleman will allow me, I would ask, if it be true that he was mustered out as a private on the 29th of June and mustered in as a second lieutenant to date from the 1st of July—and he alleges in the declaration for a pension that the disability was incurred subsequently to the 1st of July—I would like to know the reason why the Commissioner of Pensions made so grave a mistake as to have found that he was simply entitled to a pension as a sergeant. I think there is a mistake somewhere along the line of this case as to the facts.

Mr. MATSON. I think I can perhaps give the gentleman a satisfactory answer to that question. The report shows that this soldier was sick, for he was then an enlisted man, some time in June, but that the particular complaint, which I need not mention—a reference to the report will disclose what that is—probably arose subsequent to the time of his being taken sick. Gentlemen perhaps will remember the nature of the disease for which he is pensioned.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Is it not true, then, that in his application for a pension he alleges the disease was incurred prior to the 1st day of July?

Mr. MATSON. Perhaps he did allege that he was taken sick and it resulted in this thing, and the evidence seems to show that the disease for which he is now claiming a pension had its origin, growth, and development subsequent to the time at which he was mustered as a second lieutenant. Therefore the committee, while not favorable usually to the applications for rerating pensions, thought that under the circumstances this case was fairly shown to be one in which the rating should be made to this person as an officer from the date of the passage of the act, but not to go back.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If the disabilities for which this soldier was pensioned originated after the date of his commission and the date at which he was entitled to muster, then clearly he is entitled to the increase; but if not, if the disability was really incurred before that date, I think it a very bad way to increase pensions by increasing rank. I think the whole question ought to turn upon that fact. If the disability was incurred prior to the date of his commission and the date at which he was entitled to be mustered, then the pension ought not to be increased in this way; but if it was incurred after that date, then I have no objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. CUTCHEON. There is no doubt in this case in regard to certain things. There is no doubt but this man ceased to be an enlisted man prior to the 1st of July, 1863, and from that time he was not only performing the duties of a commissioned officer, but when he was mustered his muster was dated back, so that it took effect from the 1st of July. The whole question is whether the disability was incurred while he was an enlisted man or whether it was incurred after he became a commissioned officer.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Before or after July 1; that is the whole question.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Yes, sir; before or after July 1. Now, as throwing some light on the question, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that after the 1st of July, to wit, on the 6th of July, he set out with us on that march from Vicksburg to Jackson, performing the duties of a commissioned officer; in other words, that the illness or disease, or whatever it may be called, with which he was afflicted during the month of June did not prevent him from performing his duties as an enlisted man and did not prevent him from entering on the discharge of his duties as a commissioned officer; and that while he was in the discharge of his duties as a commissioned officer this disease fastened itself on him and disabled and disqualified him; and from that time dates the permanent disease which has ever since followed and disabled him. Therefore it seems apparent to me that the disability dates from the time he was a commissioned officer and not from the time he was an enlisted man.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], which the Clerk will again report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "passage of this act," and insert in lieu thereof, "incurrence of the disease."

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 11, noes 31.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

MALVIN PIERCE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1985) granting a pension to Malvin Pierce.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Malvin Pierce, late first sergeant of Company E, Eighth Michigan Cavalry Volunteers.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1985) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Malvin Pierce on the pension-rolls of the United States, respectfully report:

That Melvin Pierce was a sergeant in Company E, Eighth Michigan Cavalry. His total disability while in the line of duty appears clearly established by the records of his case. He was a prisoner of war at Andersonville, Ga., and other points for about eight months. General S. S. Fry, who commanded in Kentucky during the early part of the war, speaks very highly of Pierce, the latter having been a clerk at his headquarters. The evidence of General Fry and many other witnesses shows him to have been free from any habits of dissipation, and that he was very attentive to his duties. He entered the Army a healthy, able-bodied man, and returned from it a wreck.

While in prison at Andersonville, Ga., he, with about a thousand others, were offered the opportunity of taking the oath of allegiance as soldiers of the Confederacy. The oath was administered orally, the men repeating it altogether. Pierce swears he went out with the others, but did not take the oath; that he accepted the offer of the enemy to save his life, and that he nor any of his comrades were ever given arms except ten or twelve old muskets, with which was performed guard duty over themselves. He testifies that he never bore arms against the United States, and that he did not aid the so-called Confederate States in the war of the rebellion.

Shortly after taking the oath, so called, he was taken to the hospital delirious, where he remained at Macon, Ga., until General Wilson captured the city. The Pension Office rejected the application for pension on the sole ground that he went into the confederate service.

In consideration of the terrible sufferings endured by prisoners of war at Andersonville, and that, as stated by the applicant for pension, it was the alternative of death or the oath, we recommend the granting of a pension to applicant, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

FRANK F. FITKIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1986) granting a pension to Frank F. Fitkin.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Frank F. Fitkin, late a private in Company B, Thirty-first Regiment of Iowa Infantry Volunteers.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1986), authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-rolls of the United States the name of Frank F. Fitkin, respectfully report:

That they have examined the record in this case, and find that Frank F. Fitkin entered the service as a private in Company B, Thirty-first Iowa Volunteers, on the 13th of August, 1862, and was discharged May 26, 1865. He claims disability by reason of kidney disease and rupture incurred while in the line of duty as a soldier. The evidence showing that his disability exists is conclusive. The examining surgeon to whom this case was referred reports that disability on hernia would entitle him to $2 a month, and his disability on cystitis to $3 a month. That his disabilities originated in the service was shown by uncontradicted testimony. The hernia was received by a fall at the battle of Mission Ridge, while a member of Company G, Ninth Iowa Volunteers.

The committee would recommend that he be placed on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension law, to take effect from and after the passage of this bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I would like to ask why the Commissioner of Pensions did not put this man on the roll?

Mr. HOLMES. The Pension Office thought there was not sufficient evidence showing that the injury originated while the soldier was in the line of duty.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The report says there was.

Mr. HOLMES. We think the evidence establishes that fact. That he received the injury in the service there is no question. Whether he received it in the line of duty was a question with the Pension Office. We think, in view of all the evidence there is on record, the pension should not be refused. The committee, taking that view, authorized a favorable report. That the soldier received his disability while in the line of duty, we think there can be no question.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

F. NELSON, T. CAINE, AND H. C. SANDERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1711) granting pensions to Frederick Nelson, T. Caine, and Henry C. Sanders.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the names of Frederick Nelson, T. Caine, and Henry C. Sanders, of Wyoming Territory, late employés of the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army, who were severely wounded and disabled for life, while connected with Major Thornburgh's expedition, in the engagement with the Ute Indians, September 29, 1879.

The report (made by Mr. HOLMES) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1711) granting a pension to Frederick Nelson, T. Caine, and H. C. Sanders, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to make the following report:

This bill was introduced in the Forty-seventh Congress (H. R. 4982) and reported favorably upon from the committee, No. 1471. A careful review of the bill and the facts sustaining it seem to fully warrant the favorable report made upon it in the Forty-seventh Congress. It was not reached for action during that Congress. The report made by the former committee, and above referred to, is so fair and complete a résumé that the committee incorporate it herewith in their report.

"Mr. CULLEN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, submitted the following report, to accompany bill H. R. 4982:

"The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4982) granting a pension to Frederick Nelson, T. Caine, and R. Sanders, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to make the following report:

"In support of the bill claimants present the certificates of Capt. James Gilliss, assistant quartermaster United States Army, and R. S. Vickery, assistant surgeon United States Army, at Fort D. A. Russell, Wyoming Territory.

"Captain Gilliss certifies that at the time of the fight of Maj. T. T. Thornburgh, Fourth United States Infantry, with the Ute Indians on Milk River, Colorado, September 29, 1879, Henry C. Sanders was in the employ of the Quartermaster's Department as a citizen blacksmith. Also, that at said time and place Frederick Nelson and Thomas Cain were employed as teamsters in the Quartermaster's Department.

"Surgeon Vickery certifies as follows:

"'The following-named men, employés in the quartermaster's department, were with the command of Capt. J. S. Payne, Fifth Cavalry, in action with the Ute Indians on Milk River, Colorado, September 29, 1879, and were wounded in that action, and were received into this hospital October 19, 1879, with other wounded men from the same field.

"'Their condition then was as follows:

"'Frederick Nelson, gunshot wound of left shoulder, the bullet passing over and grazing the bone; gunshot wound of left leg, the ball entering at lower and outer border of left thigh, ranging downward; it still remains deeply lodged among the muscles. He had also scars of wounds received in the war of the rebellion—a shell wound fracturing the right leg, and a flesh wound of neck from rifle-ball. He was in this hospital until March 2, 1880, and still remains totally disabled, the result of his wounds.

knee, wounding the bone and opening the joint. As the result of it there has been much inflammation and an immense amount of suppuration all along the leg and thigh. He is still confined to bed in hospital, but is now recovering. Totally and permanently disabled.

"'Thomas Caine, bullet wound of chest, right side; the ball entered over third rib and came out between seventh and eighth rib, fracturing the ribs and perforating the lung. He was discharged from hospital, wound healed, January 5, 1880.'

"There is also on file the following statement by Capt. J. S. Payne, Fifth Cavalry, commanding the expedition against the Utes, indorsed upon letter addressed to him by Frederick Nelson:

"'Nelson was with my command as teamster in the campaign last fall, and served in that capacity faithfully. During the affair of Milk River, September 29, October 5, he did the duty of a soldier courageously and cheerfully until he received a painful wound, from which he is now suffering and by which he is disabled for life. His conduct came under my personal observation, and I take pleasure in recommending that a pension be granted him.'

"In addition to the above there is on file the following house joint resolution and memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Wyoming Territory:

"'To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

"'Your memorialists, the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Wyoming, respectfully represent that H. C. Sanders, Fred. Nelson, and Thomas Caine, citizens of this Territory, while in the employ of the United States Government, and doing duty as soldiers under the orders of officers of the United States Army, were wounded and permanently disabled in an engagement with the Ute Indians at Milk River, Colorado; said engagement being known to the country as the "Thornburgh massacre.

"'And your petitioners would further represent that these persons, being disabled for life while protecting the property of the United States, and taking arms against the public enemy in obedience to Army authority, are entitled to relief of a suitable pension in each case, such as the gratitude and liberality of a great power naturally award to its defenders at all times.

"'As under existing United States laws there are no provisions by which claims of this class can be adjudicated and allowed, your petitioners pray that the persons hereinbefore mentioned, upon showing by proper affidavits their authorized service of and employment by the Government, their presence at the action named, and that the wounds there received have caused permanent disability, may obtain relief at your hands by the passage of an act granting to said persons such a pension as the presentation of facts and circumstances in each case may seem to warrant. And for such action on this memorial your petitioners, the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Wyoming, will ever pray.

"'Be it resolved, That the secretary of the Territory of Wyoming be requested to forward a copy of this memorial to Hon. M. E. POST, Delegate in Congress, and that he be instructed to use his best endeavors to secure the result prayed for therein.'

"The committee are of opinion that the claimants are entitled to the relief asked for, and therefore report favorably on the same with the following amendments: Strike out the letter "R" before the word Sanders in the title of the bill and in line 6, and insert in both places the following, "Henry C.;" also strike out all after the word "seventy-nine," in line 11; and thus amended ask that it do pass."

The committee are of the opinion that the claimants should be granted the relief asked for in the bill, and report favorably on the same.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. This is another instance of an application on the part of a civilian who was in the service in connection with the Army for a pension for an injury received while in that service. I have myself no objection to the granting of pensions in all cases like this. I think this is a meritorious case, one that commends itself favorably to my consideration, as I believe it will to people generally.

But special legislation of this character results in wrong-doing, in that it leaves without the pale a large number of others who are equally entitled to like relief. They should be permitted to receive the same benefits that the more industrious applicant receives, who comes to Congress and obtains the relief asked for. For the purpose of remedying what to my mind is this wrong, I will move that the Committee of the Whole be instructed to report this bill back to the House with a recommendation that it be recommitted to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and that that committee be instructed to report a general bill which will cover all cases of this kind, so that the parties entitled to this relief may present their claims to the Pension Bureau and have them granted.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I make the point of order that it was decided this afternoon by the then chairman of the Committee of the Whole that such a motion as that submitted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN ALSTYNE] is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. A motion to recommit can be made only in the House.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. Then I give notice that I will make the motion in the House.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. It seems to me that the Committee of the Whole has the right to report a bill back to the House with a recommendation. I do not know any rule to prevent it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. It was decided expressly to the contrary this afternoon. As a matter of course the Committee of the Whole can not recommit a bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. It is not proposed that the Committee of the Whole shall do it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. In the House a motion to recommit may be made. In the Committee of the Whole we can only amend a bill, or lay it aside to be reported favorably or unfavorably.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The Committee of the Whole can recommend to the House what the House should do with the bill. That is the very purpose and object of considering this or any other bill in the Committee of the Whole. It is true that this Committee of the Whole can not recommit a bill, but it may recommend to the House to do so; it is but a mere recommendation.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The gentleman may be right; I do not pretend to controvert the question with him. This afternoon the then chairman of the Committee of the Whole decided differently.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. And that may have been a wrong decision.

Mr. STEELE. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEELE. The point of order has already been decided by the Chair, and debate upon it is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was indulging the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] to make his statement. The question is, Shall this bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House?

There was no objection, and the bill was accordingly laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

JULIA A. CHAMBERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4317) increasing the pension of Julia A. Chambers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Julia A. Chambers, widow of John Chambers, late an ordnance-sergeant in the United States Army, who died at Fort Monroe, January 30, 1879, and increase the pension paid her to $20 per month.

The report (made by Mr. JOHN. S. WISE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions of the Forty-seventh Congress recommend the passage of this bill. We think they were justified in so doing.

For the reasons set forth in their report, which is hereto annexed, and which we ask shall be made part hereof, we recommend the passage of the bill.

[House Report No. 173, Forty-seventh Congress, third session.]

"The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom the subject was referred, submit the following report:

"Julia A. Chambers is a pensioner at the rate of $8 per month, which she asks Congress to increase to $20 per month.

"It appears that petitioner is the widow of Ordnance-Sergeant John Chambers, United States Army, who died in the United States military service at Fort Monroe, January 30, 1879, after having served in the Army nearly half a century. It also appears that she is the daughter of William Johnson, who was in the military service of the United States for a period of thirteen years, and who was discharged therefrom by reason of wounds contracted in battle with Indians.

"Petitioner alleges that she is 60 years of age; that the greater portion of her life has been spent in the Army with her husband and father. She states that she is infirm in addition to the disability on account of age, and that the pension now paid her is wholly inadequate to satisfy her necessities.

"In view of the fact that this is an exceptional case; that she suffered the hardships of her husband and father, in their long services in the Army, the committee think the relief asked should be granted, and they recommend that the bill herewith reported do pass."

Mr. HORR. I wish that some one who knows about this case would give us some information. From what I have understood from the report it does not seem to me that this case comes within any rule which it would be safe for us to adopt.

Mr. MATSON. If the gentleman will allow me, I will try to enlighten him as much as I can. This case comes from the State of Virginia; it was introduced by a member from Virginia [Mr. LIBBEY], and was reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by a member from Virginia [Mr. JOHN S. WISE].

I think the report states very clearly the facts upon which the committee base their recommendation that the pension in this case should be increased. It appears that this woman is now quite old, and considerably infirm in addition to her age; that she is the widow of a man who served in the Army as an enlisted man for nearly fifty years, and she is the daughter of a man who served in the Army for nearly thirteen years and was discharged because of wounds received in an Indian fight. The greater portion of her own life, especially that during the time of her marriage to the soldier now dead, has been spent in the Army.

Time and time again this House has granted an increase of pension from $30 to $50 a month to widows of general officers because of their long service, because those officers had worn themselves out in the service of their Government.

Mr. HORR. Will the gentleman tell me by what parity of reasoning we should give this woman more than $8 a month, when we give the widow of a man killed in the service, of a man who lost his life in battle, only $8 a month? If the gentleman can give me any reason why this woman should be pensioned at $20 a month, and we should still retain the widows of soldiers killed in the service on the rolls at only $8 a month, I should like to hear it.

Mr. MATSON. So far as regards the retaining of the widows of soldiers on the rolls at $8 a month, I will say to the gentleman that the Committee on Invalid Pensions has reported a bill in favor of increasing the pensions of all widows of soldiers to $12 a month. A general bill of that character has been reported to the House, and we hope to pass it at an early day, and I think it will be passed substantially without objection.

Now, this bill proposes to increase the pension of this woman to $20 a month. The committee have recommended this increase because this woman is the widow of a man who was more than an ordinary soldier, who spent his whole life in the service of the Government—nearly fifty years. The committee believed this pension should be granted because of the exceptionally long service of this woman's husband, and because we have repeatedly pensioned the widows of general officers at the rate of $50 a month on account of the long service of such officers.

This woman is very old and infirm; she asks only that her pension be increased to $20 a month. Her husband served almost as long as any officer ever served the Government continuously. He occupied the place of ordnance sergeant, which I am informed by the distinguished gentleman on my left [Mr. ROSECRANS] is a very responsible position. He was, during his term of service in charge for many years of Fort Washington, down the river here. The Committee thought in view of this man's exceptionally long service—I wish to impress that fact upon gentlemen of the House—this pension should be granted.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] how it happens that his committee is taking jurisdiction of bills of this kind. This is about the third or fourth bill of this sort reported from that committee.

Mr. MATSON. If the gentleman desires to have any bills for consideration by his committee, I can say that we have plenty to spare.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I simply wanted an explanation of the matter.

Mr. MATSON. I do not know how this particular bill came before our committee. But I know it has been reported by us. However, as this man served during the last war, that fact would entitle our committee to jurisdiction of the case.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Can the gentleman from Indiana state something about the financial circumstances of this woman?

Mr. MATSON. She is very poor; and, as the report states, her present pension is not sufficient to meet her absolute necessities.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I wish to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question. What pension would this sergeant have been entitled to under the pension laws had he been totally disabled?

Mr. MATSON. There are three grades of disability——

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I mean what is understood by the term "total disability"—not special disability.

Mr. MATSON. For the highest grade of disability, the pension is $50 a month.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not mean specific disability; I mean total disability of his grade.

Mr. HORR. Eight dollars a month would have been the pension.

Mr. MATSON. Eight dollars a month is the pension allowed to those who are totally incapacitated for the performance of hard manual labor. Twenty-four dollars a month is the rate for those incapacitated for the performance of any manual labor. Fifty dollars a month is allowed to those who are so totally helpless as to require the regular assistance and attendance of another person.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then it appears that the pension to which the husband would have been entitled had he been totally disabled is $8 a month. The rule which has been very seldom departed from has been not to grant by special acts any greater pension to the widow than the husband would have been entitled to.

It seems to me that the grounds upon which it is proposed to grant this increase of pension are all wrong. Inquiries are made as to the pecuniary circumstances of this widow. Why, sir, half the world, I was about to say, is half the time on the ragged edge of want. The question of destitution is not a question by which to determine whether a pension should be granted in any particular case.

If this increase of pension is to be granted upon the ground of service, that reason fails. I hold that pensions should be granted for disability only, not for service, not for destitution. The husband in this case would have been entitled to $8 a month. The widow, though she may be, like thousands and tens of thousands of others, aged and destitute, should receive no more than $8 a month.

I can see no reason in this case for departing from the ordinary rule. If it is proposed to raise the pensions of all widows, very good; then this pension will go up when the general increase is made. But there has been no substantial reason given for the passage of this special act, except a pitiful story, such as can be told with equal truth in hundreds and thousands of other cases.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, general rules are established by Congress for the pensioning of deserving persons—soldiers, their widows and orphans. Congress has unquestionably the right to establish such general laws. But it appears that the Committee on Invalid Pensions think the facts are sufficient to justify them in recommending us to make an exception in the case of this woman. We have just as much right to make an exception as we have to establish the rule. We make exceptions quite often for the benefit of the widows of field officers—men who have held high rank in the Army. I think we can with equally good grace make an exception for the benefit of a poor woman, whose father and husband spent their lives in the service of the Government, she herself, by reason of their services, not having had the advantages of that home-life wherein she might have gathered about her the comforts required in old age.

I hardly think it worth our while to cavil and quibble about doing a generous and graceful thing to this poor woman.

Mr. MATSON. If it were an original proposition, to increase pensions of the widows of distinguished general officers I should not favor it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. They are the last cases.

Mr. MATSON. But after it has been done to them, I could not have the face to refuse this poor woman.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. You are right in that.

Mr. MATSON. The precedents are bad.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is true.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ANSON B. SAMS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1127) granting a pension to Anson B. Sams.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place the name of Anson B. Sams, late of the Third North Carolina Mounted Infantry, on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and restrictions of the pension laws.

The report was read, as follows:

Anson B. Sams, private, duly enlisted in Company A, Second Regiment North Carolina Mounted Infantry, was attacked in December, 1863, with hernia and weakness of the eyes from exposure in actual service. We think he proves this satisfactorily by his comrades. There is some technical trouble as to his production of medical certificates, growing, doubtless, out of his being an assistant surgeon and treating himself. The Committee on Invalid Pensions in the Forty-seventh Congress reported favorably on his claim. We do likewise.

We recommend passage of the bill, with an amendment making it read "Company A, Second North Carolina Mounted Infantry."

The CHAIRMAN. The first question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

P. M. SHANNON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4613) granting a pension to P. M. Shannon.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of P. M. Shannon.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4613) granting a pension to Preston M. Shannon, submit the following report:

The testimony in this case is very strong, and to the mind of your committee is conclusive of claimant's disability, its origin in the service, its continuance up to the present time, and in fact that it is permanent, and that he is entitled to a pension.

The testimony is very clear that he was sound when he enlisted, that he came out of service afflicted with rheumatism, and that he still suffers with the same to a degree that disables him from earning a living by manual labor.

It seems that his claim was rejected because he was unable to show medical treatment while in the service, and for a period of some space after he was discharged from the Army; and also because there is no hospital or other record of treatment in the service. But he has satisfactorily accounted for these omissions, in the opinion of your committee, by showing that his regimental surgeon had been dead for several years when he prepared his case, and that he was unable to ascertain the whereabouts of the assistant surgeon, if indeed he was then living. He also gives satisfactory reasons why he was treated in camp and not in the hospital.

His captain and other witnesses, shown to be entitled to credit, testify as to the origin of his disability while in the service and its continuance up to the time when they made their affidavits, of such a character as to indicate that he is permanently disabled therefrom.

After a careful examination of all the testimony, your committee believe that he is entitled to a pension, and therefore report back bill H. R. 4613, and recommend that the same be passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendments reported by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "P." and insert "Preston;" and after "Shannon" insert "late of Company —, Third Tennessee Infantry."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Preston M. Shannon."

Mr. STEELE. I never before heard of a company blank. I did not know we had any such in the service. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOUK. When I drew the bill I did not exactly know the letter of the company and so I left it blank. I know this man and that he served in the Third Tennessee Infantry.

Mr. STEELE. If the gentleman from Tennessee knows the man it is all right.

Mr. HOUK. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by making it read "Third Tennessee Infantry."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and then the amendments of the committee as amended were concurred in.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZABETH MOYAL.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. HOUK. I hope not. I have not been greedy in reporting these cases, and I hope the gentleman will withdraw his motion so we may consider the next bill which was reported by me.

Mr. MATSON. Very well, then; I will withdraw my motion.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1836) for the relief of Elizabeth Moyal.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth Moyal, mother of Stephen

Moyal, late of Company K, Tenth Regiment Tennessee Cavalry, in the war of 1861.

The report w read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1836) for the relief of Elizabeth Moyal, submit the following report:

This is a claim by a dependent mother. Her dependence on this soldier is substantially and sufficiently proven. The right of claimant to her pension is established provided the soldier was in the line of his duty when killed. The facts are these: The lieutenant-colonel of his regiment and the captain of his company and several comrades testify that the command halted to take a meal at Natchez, Miss., when the soldiers' mess, composed of several comrades, made a small stick fire to boil coffee. At this juncture one of the mess—and the weight of the proof shows it was the deceased—put his pot on the fire, when a comrade by the name of Redden removed it, from which act a dispute arose, in the midst of which Redden stabbed and killed the soldier, the son of claimant.

The evidence shows the soldier to have a good record, and there is nothing to show that he was at any fault in the controversy which ended in his death. We think he lost his life in the line of duty, and that his mother, being dependent on him at the time, is entitled to a pension, and therefore report back H. R. 1836, and recommend that it do pass.

Mr. HOUK. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I ask for a division on that motion.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 40, noes 4.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. No quorum has voted.

Mr. HOUK. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon that point of order.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I will not if the gentleman will agree to let the committee rise after this bill has been disposed of.

Mr. HOUK. All right.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I withdraw the point of no quorum.

So the motion was agreed to; and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. MATSON. I now move the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, reported that the Committee of the Whole House had according to order had under consideration the pension cases on the Private Calendar, and had directed him to report back sundry bills with various recommendations.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar with favorable recommendations were severally considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, namely:

A bill (H. R. 283) granting a pension to Patrick Horan;

A bill (H. R. 284) for the relief of Mary G. Hawk;

A bill (H. R. 4059) granting a pension to Isaac Demaranville;

A bill (H. R. 4317) increasing the pension of Julia A. Chambers; and

A bill (H. R. 1836) for the relief of Elizabeth Moyal.

The following bills reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar with amendments were severally considered, the amendments agreed to, and the bills as amended ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and, being engrossed, were read the third time, and passed, namely:

A bill (H. R. 4180) granting an increase of pension to Rowland Ward;

A bill (H. R. 1056) granting a pension to Honora Kelley;

A bill (H. R. 1127) granting a pension to Anson B. Sams; and

A bill (H. R. 4613) granting a pension to P. M. Shannon.

The SPEAKER. The titles will be amended so as to conform to the action of the House if there be no objection.

MARCUS A. HAMILTON.

The following bill, reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar with an adverse recommendation, was considered, the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole concurred in, and the bill ordered to be laid on the table, namely:

A bill (H. R. 2407) for the relief of Marcus A. Hamilton.

Mr. MATSON moved to reconsider the several votes above taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 9 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, April 5, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK, IN ASSEMBLY,
Albany, March 20, 1884.

Whereas the Constitution of the United States prohibits a State from levying any tax upon commerce for purposes of revenue; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States has an unquestioned power to establish a system of fees for the support, care, and maintenance of quarantine: Therefore,

Resolved (if the senate concur), That the Congress of the United States be, and is hereby, requested to establish by law such just and equitable fees for the port of New York, and for all ports of entry in the United States, as a conference of the representatives of the State boards of health of the maritime States and of the National Board of Health may recommend or as Congress in its wisdom may enact: the object of this resolution being to establish economical and efficient commercial and health service in the principal maritime ports of the country.

By order. CHAS. A. CHICKERING, Clerk.

IN SENATE, April 2, 1884.

Concurred in without amendment.

By order. JOHN W. VROOMAN, Clerk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Tacoma, Wash., praying that Tacoma be made a port of entry; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present the petition of Anderson Winfrey, of Carrollton, Mo., praying reimbursement for expenditures made by him during the year 1864 for recruits for the Forty-fourth Missouri Volunteer Infantry, with affidavits of Henry C. Manning, William N. Waters, and John T. Patton to accompany the same. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I think the petition had better be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will state that having been a member of the Committee on Claims and the Committee on Military Affairs for six years, at one time on both committees, I find that I made reports from each of those committees on this very question; so there is no regularity in the reference. Sometimes such matters are sent to the Committee on Military Affairs and sometimes they are sent to the Committee on Claims. I find that I myself have reported from both committees on this question.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Let the petition go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the petition will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SAWYER presented a petition of Johannes Brothers and 6 other dealers in tobacco at Green Bay and Fort Howard, Wis., asking for additional clerical force in the First Comptroller's Office, to prevent the present delay in the settlement of claims for rebate; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a memorial of Capt. David Evans and 6 other officers of the revenue-marine service, in favor of the passage of the bill (H. R. 4483) to promote the efficiency of the revenue-marine service and providing for retiring the aged and disabled officers and regulating examinations in the revenue-marine service; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LOGAN presented a petition of officers of the line of the United States Army, praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 1667 extending the provisions of section 1207 Revised Statutes of the United States to the lieutenants of the line of the Army, and subject to the restrictions and conditions contained in the said bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of John G. Burchfield, late private Company G, Thirteenth Regiment Tennessee Cavalry, praying to be granted an invalid pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Shawneetown, Ill., praying an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DAWES presented a memorial of citizens of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the passage of certain bills for the amendment of the patent laws; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1716) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Springfield, Ohio, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1715) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Dayton, Ohio, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Some time ago a bill (S. 1934) authorizing the Court of Claims to grant a rehearing in the case of Sophia B. Moore vs. The United States was introduced and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Subsequently some documents relating to the bill were presented and by mistake referred to the Committee on Claims. I report those back, and ask that the Committee on Claims be discharged from their further consideration and that they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary where the bill is.

The report was agreed to.

FALSE PERSONATION OF GOVERNMENT OFFICERS.

Mr. GARLAND. The Committee on the Judiciary have had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4993) making it a felony for a person to falsely and fraudulently assume or pretend to be an officer or employé acting under authority of the United States or any Department thereof, and prescribing a penalty therefor, and have instructed me to report it back with two amendments. As the bill is one of importance and is being pressed by the Pension Office particularly, I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments, in line 6, after the word "Department," to insert "or any officer;" and in line 9, after the word "Department," to insert the words "or any officer;" so as to make the bill read:

That every person who, with intent to defraud either the United States or any person, falsely assumes or pretends to be an officer or employé acting under the authority of the United States, or any Department or any officer of the Government thereof, and who shall take upon himself to act as such, or who shall in such pretended character demand or obtain from any person or from the United States, or any Department or any officer of the Government thereof, any money, paper, document, or other valuable thing, shall be deemed guilty of felony, and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000, or imprisonment not longer than three years, or both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GARLAND, the title was so amended as to read: "A bill making it a felony for a person to falsely and fraudulently assume or pretend to be an officer or employé acting under authority of the United States, or any Department or any officer thereof, and prescribing a penalty therefor."

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 2000) to reimburse the several States for interest paid on war loans, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SAWYER introduced a bill (S. 2001) for the relief of Hiram S. Richardson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HARRIS introduced a bill (S. 2003) to correct the military record of William S. Smith, of Tennessee; which was read twice by its title, and, with the papers on file relating to the case, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SILK-CULTURE.

Mr. MORGAN. I present a memorial from the State board of silk-culture of California, and in connection with that memorial, and by request, I desire to offer a bill on the same subject, which I wish to bring to the attention of the Senate. The memorial sets forth the progress of silk-culture in California and is a most instructive and interesting paper. It is very brief, and I trust the Senate will indulge me in the request that it may be printed in the RECORD. One feature of it is remarkable. I will read that part of it:

For these reasons principally we shall not ask at the hands of your honorable body any protective tariff upon the raw material. We are satisfied that American skilled labor, with the superior improved appliances of mechanical invention as compared with the servile labor of foreign lands, confined to the crude and imperfect appliances for reeling and preparing raw silk which have been but little improved for centuries, will render our products of such superior fineness and reliability as to successfully compete with all rivals, even at present prices.

I had the honor when the existing tariff was under discussion in the Senate to propose an amendment to the tariff bill to take raw silk, reeled silk, from the free-list and put it under a duty of 10 per cent. ad valorem, my purpose being to give some encouragement to an industry which had been entirely neglected in the United States, and also because I believed that silk in all of its uses was comparatively a luxury and that it was a proper subject of taxation.

On reading the memorial of this California Silk Culture Association and the report which accompanies it, the first annual report of that association, I have become satisfied that the remedy I then proposed for their relief is not necessary, and inasmuch as this is the first industry, I believe, that has ever memorialized Congress disclaiming any desire to have a protective tariff levied upon the country in its favor, I think it is my duty to request that the memorial shall go into the RECORD, and I ask its reference to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. MORGAN. In that connection I ask leave to present the report of the association and ask its reference to the same committee.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I desire to ask the Senator what the memorial prays for.

Mr. MORGAN. I omitted to state that it prays for a silk-culture bureau in the Department of Agriculture, through which facilities may be furnished for distributing the eggs and plants, different descriptions of mulberry, and information in respect of the reeling and preparation of silk for the weavers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama, the Chair understands, desires that the memorial be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MORGAN. The memorial, but not the report accompanying it.

The memorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Memorial of the California Silk-Culture Association.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

We, the undersigned, officers and members of the California Silk-Culture Association, respectfully represent to your honorable body that the production of raw silk in the United States is entirely practicable; that it ought to be and may easily be made one of the great industries of the country, and that in view of its importance and practicability it is highly deserving of encouragement from the National Government.

We beg leave to submit to your consideration the following very brief summary of facts:

The estimated value of the raw silk produced in all the countries of the world amounts to the enormous sum of $400,000,000 annually, most of which is derived from those Asiatic countries to which the raising of this precious fiber has been principally confined since its origination there in the early dawn of human civilization.

In every country where silk is produced in considerable quantities this source of wealth has been recognized as meriting public protection and encouragement, and particularly in its infancy has it received pecuniary aid from governments. So jealousy did the Chinese Government guard this interest, that the cultivation of silk was not permitted to go beyond its boundaries for thousands of years, when in the sixth century two missionaries, at the risk of their lives, conveyed clandestinely, by the aid of a hollow cane sufficient silk-worm eggs to commence the business in the vicinity of Constantinople, whence it spread through nearly every European country.

In France, Italy, Germany, and all other enlightened lands where silk has become a valuable article of commerce, it has attained such importance through the fostering care and financial aid extended to it by the governments of those countries; and even China and Japan still continue, as they have done for centuries, to extend royal recognition to this gigantic and beneficent industry by frequent edicts of their sovereigns for the further development and protection of silk products.

The importation of silk fabrics into the United States amounts to about $35,000,000 annually, while the cost of the raw material which is required to supply our three hundred and eighty-eight silk factories amounts at the lowest estimate to about $20,000,000 each year. Of this sum China and Japan receive the greatest part, yet there are nearly two-thirds of the territory of the United States where the production of raw silk can be accomplished with more satisfactory results than in those lands of the Occident.

The practicability of silk-culture in the United States has passed through the experimental stage and has now assumed the form of one of the most important questions pertaining to American industry and commerce. That our soil and climate, and particularly those of California, owing to the absence of thunder-storms and of rains in summer, are peculiarly adapted to silk raising is conceded by silk experts throughout the world who have investigated our advantages; and the fact presents itself to us as a nation that every dollar of the thirty-five or forty millions paid annually to foreign silk producers should flow into the coffers of our own laboring classes; and that the 200,000 surplus working women of this country, who are to-day employed at starvation wages in avenues of labor already greatly overcrowded or not employed at all, might be made happy, well-paid workers in this lucrative and most attractive field of industry.

The aggregate valuation of the silk products of American mills is about $80,000,000 annually, and yet this important branch of manufacture is compelled to rely mainly upon the producers of Asia for the raw material whence this vast sum is realized.

That the reeled silk brought into this country from China and Japan is so shamelessly adulterated with various weighty substances as to entail a loss of at least 40 per cent. upon the purchasing manufacturer is too well known to require further notice. That American-raised silk is free from all this adulteration is an undisputed fact, and the saving to the consumer would amount to about $20,000,000 if this amount of raw material were supplied to our factories by our own people, as it well can be.

That the more favored localities of the United States, and particularly California, where silk-culture has received attention, can be made enormously productive and of the best quality of this costly fiber is unquestioned, as is also the superiority of American mechanism over that of all other portions of the globe.

For these reasons, principally, we shall not ask at the hands of your honorable body any protective tariff upon the raw material. We are satisfied that American skilled labor, with the superior improved appliances of mechanical invention as compared with the servile labor of foreign lands, confined to the crude and imperfect appliances for reeling and preparing raw silk, which have been but little improved for centuries, will render our products of such superior fineness and reliability as to successfully compete with all rivals, even at present prices.

The rapid advance made in silk-culture through the aid of governmental encouragement, particularly where it is struggling into existence, constrains us to urge upon your honorable body the wisdom of rendering pecuniary assistance to this most important branch of industrial wealth. The recent experiment made in our State of California by the creation of a State board of silk-culture commissioners, the establishment of a silk-reeling school or filature, and an appropriation of public money to maintain the same, convinces us that the only sure and speedy avenue to the successful development of this eventually profitable industry is through national legislation in its behalf; and, with this end in view, we earnestly petition your honorable body to make an appropriation of $150,000, to be divided equally between a silk-culture bureau at Washington and five experimental silk-culture stations to be located in connection with school gardens and filatures in States possessing the greatest natural advantages for producing silk, and that one of them shall be established in California at some point easily accessible from San Francisco.

And your memorialists will ever pray, &c.

MRS. LAURA DE FORCE GORDON,
MRS. E. B. BARKER,
MRS. THEODORE H. HITTELL,
CHARLES A. BUCKBEE,
THEODORE H. HITTELL,
Committee on Memorial.

THE CALIFORNIA SILK-CULTURE ASSOCIATION,
By MRS. E. B. BARKER, President,
MISS SALLIE R. HEATH, Secretary.

SAN FRANCISCO, February 12, 1884.

The bill (S. 2002) for the creation of a silk-culture bureau and the establishment of silk-culture stations was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

PATENT BILLS.

Mr. PLATT. The copies of Senate bill No. 1115, House bill No. 3925, and House bill No. 3934, relating to practice in patent suits, have been exhausted. I wish to have the usual number of copies reprinted, and therefore ask for the adoption of the following order:

Ordered, That the bills S. 1115, H. R. 3925, and H. R. 3934 be reprinted for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be granted, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

REPORT ON ALASKA.

Mr. BOWEN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Territories:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate the official report by Lieut. Frederick Schwatka, United States Army, of his military reconnaissance of 1883 from Chilkaht Inlet, Alaska, to Fort Selkirk, on Yukon River, Alaska.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolutions," that order is closed, and the Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. BLAIR rose.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from New Hampshire, I suppose, rises to move to take up the unfinished business. I do not propose to antagonize that, but I think it my duty to say that on Monday next I shall ask the Senate, whatever may be then before it, to lay aside the unfinished business and take up the naval appropriation bill. It was reported to the Senate on Tuesday last, and in reporting it I gave notice that I would call it up probably not later than Thursday, but the debate ran on upon the bill in charge of the Senator from New Hampshire, and hoping that the consideration of that bill would be completed this week, I have refrained from bringing the naval appropriation bill before the Senate.

I hope we may be able to finish the educational bill to-day; but whether we do or not, I shall feel like taking the sense of the Senate upon proceeding with the naval appropriation bill on Monday. It is a most important bill. The Committee on Appropriations has incorporated very important amendments upon the House bill, which I presume the Senate will adopt, as it has already taken action in that direction, and the bill ought to go back to the House very soon for consideration there. I do not need now to urge upon Senators the importance of getting the appropriation bills through as fast as they come from the House. They come slowly enough at any rate. On Monday I shall seek to call up that bill.

Mr. BLAIR. I shall hope if the Senator does make that motion, in case the Senate shall not conclude the educational bill to-day, that it may be the sense of the Senate that the educational bill is quite as important as the one to which he has alluded. It is necessary that the bill, if it becomes a law during this session at least, should reach the House of Representatives before a great length of time. The appropriation bill to which the Senator refers has of course been considered by the other branch of Congress and the educational bill has not been considered at all there. It also involves an appropriation, and after this protracted debate, which fortunately now shows indications of coming soon to a conclusion, I should expect that either Monday, or at the latest Tuesday, the Senate would be able to dispose of it finally.

Mr. HALE. The Senator will allow me——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the debate is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. HALE. I shall take but a moment. The Senator will allow me to remind him that I, as representing the Committee on Appropriations, in reporting the naval appropriation bill have not sought to push his bill out of the way, but have been very patient. The Senator should bear in mind that while the bill which he has in charge is one of the gravest importance it has already consumed nearly three weeks of the time of this body, and that if other business is to be done the educational bill must not be allowed to run its slow length much longer. I hope the Senator discovers those signs that he refers to that the debate is running out. I have not been able to see them, and therefore thought it best to give the notice.

Mr. BLAIR. Of course there is no objection to the notice, nor can the Senator fail to observe that the control of the bill has been in the Senate and not in the possession of the member now addressing the Chair. I have seen no indication on the part of the Senate to shirk the usual amount of labor, nor have I been able to discover any lack of interest in the speeches which have been made or in the importance of those speeches as touching the general welfare of the country. Although it has been a somewhat protracted debate, I do not think that any Senator should intimate to the Senate that it has been wasting its time. I hope that as long as we have proceeded to so near the close of that debate the Appropriations Committee, which after all must like the rest of us have some regard to the general sentiments of the Senate at large, will permit us to complete the consideration of the bill.

So far as the use of the time between now and Monday at 12 o'clock is concerned I shall be here until that time, and will urge the consideration of the bill so far as it seems to be a proper thing to do consistent with its interests and the public interests generally.

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BLAIR. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognized the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SAWYER. I ask to take from the Calendar Senate bill No. 1797 and put it on its passage. It is a bill for the construction of a railroad bridge across the Saint Croix River. The bridge is to cross the river above where almost all the commerce is. There is very little commerce above there. It is a high bridge. The Saint Croix is a tributary of the Mississippi——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that debate is not in order on a motion to take up the bill.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President——

Mr. SAWYER. If it takes any time I shall not press it at this time.

Mr. BLAIR. Is not my motion pending and may it no the acted upon?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire, the Chair understands, did not make any motion.

Mr. BLAIR. I certainly made the motion. I moved that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. SAWYER. I was recognized by the Chair and made a motion to proceed to the consideration of the bridge bill.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not wish to interfere, but let the educational bill be taken up and then I will give way in the usual formal manner.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands from the notes of the Reporter that the Senator from New Hampshire did not make any motion until the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER] had risen and addressed the Chair and had been recognized.

Mr. BLAIR. I was not aware that the Senator from Wisconsin had addressed the Chair before I made the motion. I had not resumed my seat.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair felt bound, as a matter of duty, to put the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin to proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

The motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE OVER SAINT CROIX RIVER.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1797) to authorize the construction of a railroad bridge across the Saint Croix River, in the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 22, after the word "feet," to strike out the words:

And provided further, That if said bridge shall be so built, the detention of passing said bridge shall not be construed as interfering with the navigation of the stream. And further.

And to insert the word "provided."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 4, after the word "shall," to insert "from time to time;" and in line 7, after the word "of," to strike out "a" and insert "the proposed;" so as to read:

That any bridge authorized to be constructed under this act shall be built and located under and subject to such regulations for the security of navigation of said river as the Secretary of War shall from time to time prescribe; and to secure that object the said company shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a design and drawing of the bridge and a map of the proposed location, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add as an additional section:

SEC. 3. That the said railroad company shall have the right to construct passage-ways on said bridge for foot-passengers and vehicles of every description, and to charge a reasonable toll therefor; but the rates of toll shall be submitted to the Secretary of War, and shall be subject to his approval and to any change he may think proper from time to time.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add as an additional section:

SEC. 4. That such alterations or changes as may be required by the Secretary of War or Congress in any bridge constructed under the provisions of this act shall be made by the said railroad company at their own expense; and it is hereby expressly provided that Congress reserves the right at any time to alter or amend this act.

Mr. GARLAND. I move to amend the amendment by inserting the words "or repeal" after the word "amend."

Mr. SAWYER. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. The word "or," before "amend," should be stricken out, so as to read "to alter, amend, or repeal."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The phraseology will be corrected by striking out the word "or" where it first occurs, if there be no objection.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A bill (S. 1819) to print certain eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Thomas Allen.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

Mr. BLAIR. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the education bill. The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. PLUMB to recommit the bill to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, when the Senate adjourned yesterday I was submitting for its consideration something of the constitutional history of the States at the time and before and subsequent to the adoption of the Federal Constitution in respect of the measures which they took to foster and promote the education of the people. My purpose in that reference was to show that the several States of the Union had taken that subject entirely into their own charge; that they had provided amply for the education of the people through their respective constitutions, and that therefore the education of the people was a subject connected, it is true, intimately with the general welfare, but belonging to that part of the general welfare which was left purposely in charge of the States.

I had read a portion of the constitution of Massachusetts, having previously read from the constitutions of some other States. I will proceed now to call attention to other provisions in the constitution of Massachusetts. Chapter V, section 2, of the constitution of 1780, has the following provision:

Wisdom and knowledge, as well as virtue, diffused generally among the body of the people being necessary for the preservation of their rights and liberties, and as these depend on spreading the opportunities and advantages of education in the various parts of the country and among the different orders of the people, it shall be the duty of Legislatures and magistrates in all future periods of this Commonwealth to cherish the interests of literature and the sciences, and all seminaries of them, especially the university at Cambridge, public schools, and grammar schools in the towns; to encourage private societies and public institutions, rewards and immunities, for the promotion of agriculture, arts, sciences, commerce, trades, manufactures, and a natural history of the country; to countenance and inculcate the principles of humanity and general benevolence, public and private charity, industry and frugality, honesty and punctuality in their dealings, sincerity and good humor, and all social affections and generous sentiments among the people.

Those are very important principles connected with the social welfare and the general welfare which the government of Massachusetts took into consideration in framing its constitution as early as 1780. They seemed to regard themselves as being entirely competent to the task of providing to the largest extent for the morals, the manners, the temper, the social affections, the generous sentiments of their people, and it seems not to have occurred to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts that there was any occasion for relying upon any other form of government for dealing with or assisting in any of these endeavors.

The history of Massachusetts bears out the proposition that she confided this portion of the general welfare to the proper tribunal, that she did not remit it into the hands of Senators who might be elected hereafter from Alabama and Wisconsin and Oregon and Illinois, or any of the States that were not in the contemplation of the statesmen of that day, but that she undertook in virtue of her own sovereignty, of her own powers, to provide for her people all these necessary assistants to the general welfare and their progress. They even go so far as to inculcate the duty upon the Legislature of providing by law so that sincerity and good humor and social affections and generous sentiments shall be encouraged among the people. And, sir, we see the fruit of it here in this body and elsewhere. We see the high degree of intelligence which Massachusetts has aided to distribute throughout the length and breadth of this land, and we see how uniformly good-natured and good-humored are the representatives from that splendid Commonwealth. I congratulate that ancient Commonwealth upon her success in laying down in her constitution those principles of government which belong appropriately to the States, and which have brought such beneficent results upon individuals as well as upon the entire community.

Now I turn back to the earlier part of the same constitution, and I read articles 4 and 5, for the purpose of impressing still more firmly upon the mind of the Senate and of the country the fact that while Massachusetts was ordaining these very ideas and duties of benevolence to her own people, she was protecting her people and her State rights, in addition to the guarantees which were found in the Articles of Confederation and the Constitution of the United States, by a declaration of certain principles and rights and powers belonging to the State which are totally incompatible with the idea that Congress was left, by Massachusetts at least, in the guardianship of the education of her people, or of any other matter that pertained to their social and personal welfare as individuals or as a community. Articles 4 and 5 say:

ART. IV. The people of this Commonwealth have the sole and exclusive right of governing themselves as a free, sovereign, and independent State, and do, and forever hereafter shall, exercise and enjoy every power, jurisdiction, and right which is not, or may not hereafter be, by them expressly delegated to the United States of America in Congress assembled.

ART. V. All power residing originally in the people, and being derived from them, the several magistrates and officers of government vested with authority, whether legislative, executive, or judicial, are the substitutes and agents, and are at all times accountable to them.

If there was no other fact in this whole history but the single fact that Massachusetts, one of the States which framed the Constitution of the United States, had made in her constitution the express reservation of power which I have just read, and had expressly said that she shall hereafter enjoy every power, jurisdiction, and right which is not or may not hereafter be by them expressly delegated to the United States of America in Congress assembled, that would be sufficient as an answer to the proposition that she had reserved to herself the right to exercise every power and duty toward her people which she expressed in this Constitution, and every power and duty to her people which she did not expressly delegate to the United States in forming their constitution. How could it be argued against Massachusetts, with her constitution thus pregnant with denials of the power of Congress to regulate the general welfare upon the subject of education, that she had surrendered all that right and all that power to the Congress of the United States under any circumstances or conditions or that she ever expected that she would do so?

Now, sir, I will turn to the constitution of North Carolina, that glorious old State which led the van in the declaration of her independence, and which, in her Mecklenburg declaration, put the very frame of words together which the Congress of the United States afterward adopted as the best fitted to express their views of the independence and sovereignty of the United States of America. That State ordained in the forty-first article of her constitution of 1776:

XLI. That a school or schools shall be established by the Legislature for the convenient instruction of youth, with such salaries to the masters, paid by the public, as may enable them to instruct at low prices; and all useful learning shall be duly encouraged and promoted in one or more universities.

Has North Carolina ever yielded that power to the Federal Government in any sense whatever? Has she ever so far berated her own sovereignty as to be willing to admit that the Federal Government, in these latter days, has more power than it had at the time of the formation of the Federal Constitution, and that the United States now has power which that noble State recorded as belonging solely and exclusively to her in her constitution of 1776? That constitution was formed at a time when it was necessary, as is stated in the preamble to it, to organize civil society in order to escape from the effects of the turbulence and turmoil with which the then opening war with Great Britain distressed and harassed the country, but in the midst of all these troubles and anxieties they bethought themselves of the future, and counting the fact that the principles which underlay their State constitution and their declaration of independence would inure to the advantage of their posterity for many generations to come, a proud and an independent people laid deep and well this noble foundation of State rights and State sovereignty in that grand constitution. Sir, I will not disregard it; I will not ignore it; I will not come here as a representative from Alabama presuming that I have the right to prescribe anything to North Carolina in respect to the education of her people or to put before her a condition which will humiliate her to the extent of saying "Take this money I offer you; do it on the terms I offer it; if not I will withdraw it." That State, if her voice was truly uttered upon the floor of the Senate, would respond to such a demand as that by quoting this article 41 of her constitution of 1776, and she would say "we provided before you were a State and before the Constitution of the United States was formed, and amidst the first smoke of the first battle for the independence of the country—we provided with sedateness and care for the education of our youth, and that ground we have never seen proper to abandon; content yourselves with attending to your own business and let North Carolina pursue the course that she laid down for herself and her people as far back as 1776."

Ohio put similar provisions in her constitution after being organized as a State out of territory that had been granted by Virginia, Virginia herself having accepted by an act of her Legislature the act of Congress for the organization of the Northwestern Territory which excluded slavery from that portion of the public domain, Virginia, therefore, being the first State in the American Union to put the imprimatur of her approval upon the abolition by act of Congress of slavery in any part of the territory of the United States. Ohio, in the constitution of 1802, provides in sections 25, 26, and 27 as follows:

SEC. 25. That no law shall be passed to prevent the poor in the several counties and townships within this State from an equal participation in the schools, academies, colleges, and universities within this State which are endowed in whole or in part from the revenues arising from the donations made by the United States for the support of schools and colleges; and the doors of the said schools, academies, and universities shall be open for the reception of scholars, students, and teachers of every grade, without any distinction or preference whatever contrary to the intent for which the said donations were made.

SEC. 26. The laws shall be passed by the Legislature which shall secure to each and every denomination of religious societies in each surveyed township which now is or may hereafter be formed in the State an equal participation, according to their number of adherents, of the profits arising from the land granted by Congress for the support of religion, agreeably to the ordinance or act of Congress making the appropriation.

SEC. 27. That every association of persons, when regularly formed within this State, and having given themselves a name, may, on application to the Legislature, be entitled to receive letters of incorporation to enable them to hold estates, real and personal, for the support of their schools, academies, colleges, universities, and other purposes.

That is what Ohio had to say on the subject. Pennsylvania, in 1683, in section 28 of the frame of government, as it is called, of Pennsylvania, provided:

28. That all children within this province of the age of 12 years shall be taught some useful trade or skill, to the end none may be idle, but the poor may work to live, and the rich, if they become poor, may not want.

And Vermont in 1786, in her constitution, provided:

38. Laws for the encouragement of virtue and prevention of vice and immorality ought to be constantly kept in force and duly executed, and a competent number of schools ought to be maintained in each town for the convenient instruction of youth; and one or more grammar schools be incorporated and properly supported in each county in this State. And all religious societies or bodies of men that may be hereafter united or incorporated for the advancement of religion and learning or for other pious or charitable purposes, shall be encouraged and protected in the enjoyment of the privileges, immunities, and estates which they in justice ought to enjoy, under such regulations as the General Assembly of this State shall direct.

The State of New Hampshire, which has the honor of being represented on this floor by the author of this bill, in articles 6 and 7 makes certain provisions in respect of education which are very marked in their character and which go to the whole extent of claiming exclusive jurisdiction over the subject of common-school education and every other form of education, and not only so, but of applying to it religious tests and excluding from the privileges of teaching in the schools those persons in that State who might belong to other than Protestant denominations. I do not know what they would do to those men who deny entirely the existence of the Deity, but I take it for granted that they would not be permitted under the provisions which I now read to participate in the government of any school whatever:

Sixth. As morality and piety, rightly grounded on evangelical principles, will give the best and greatest security to government, and will lay in the hearts of men the strongest obligations to due subjection; and as the knowledge of these is most likely to be propagated through a society by the institution of the public worship of the Deity and of public instruction in morality and religion: Therefore, to promote those important purposes, the people of this State have a right to empower, and do hereby fully empower the Legislature to authorize from time to time the several towns, parishes, bodies-corporate, or religious societies within this State to make adequate provision, at their own expense, for the support and maintenance of public Protestant teachers of piety, religion, and morality: Provided, notwithstanding, That the several towns, parishes, bodies-corporate, or religious societies shall at all times have the exclusive right of electing their own public teachers, and of contracting with them for their support and maintenance. And no person of any one particular religious sect or denomination shall ever be compelled to pay toward the support of the teachers of another persuasion, sect, or denomination.

And every denomination of Christians demeaning themselves quietly, and as good subjects of the State, shall be equally under the protection of the law; and no subordination of any one sect or denomination to another shall ever be established by law.

And nothing herein shall be understood to affect any former contracts made for the support of the ministry; but all such contracts shall remain and be in the same state as if this constitution had not been made.

Just here there is a remarkable provision for the propagation of the Christian faith, as understood by the Protestant denominations, in the constitutions of New Hampshire, and there are some exclusions from the right of public teaching in matters of morality and religion applicable to those who are not members of a Protestant denomination.

Now, let us take this matter under consideration for a moment. Was not that esteemed by the people of New Hampshire as being a part of the general welfare of the people of that State? Why should they go into this detailed and very elaborate statement of the rights and powers and duties of the State and of its magistracy in respect of matters of piety, morals, and religion, unless they conceived that the regulation thereof was necessary for the general welfare of the people of New Hampshire? But when it came to ordaining the Constitution of the United States, the doctrine of the divorce of the civil from the religious element had obtained such a strong foothold among the delegates representing the different States of the Confederation that a provision was incorporated in the Constitution of the United States that Congress should make no law affecting in any respect a question of religion. Here is the general welfare, so far as that power is concerned, and so far as New Hampshire is concerned, excluded in express terms from the jurisdiction of Congress and confided, therefore, into the jurisdiction of New Hampshire.

Can it be said that religion is a matter of no general concern to the people of the United States, although it may exist in a false form, or under improper conditions, in some of the States or Territories? If that be so, why have we concerned ourselves so sedulously about the prohibition of Mormonism and the breaking down of the Mormon Church in the Territory of Utah. What is it to the citizen of Alabama if a priest or a member of the Mormon Church chooses to indulge in polygamy in the Territory of Utah? Nothing but the public scandal and disgrace of such a matter upon the institutions of our country, nothing but the planting of a seed of immorality there, which, if tolerated, may spring up into a crop of unrighteousness and wickedness throughout the whole length and breadth of our great population. Yet we deny expressly to Congress the power to legislate on any subject touching religion; and New Hampshire put in her constitution of 1792, and has retained to this very day, many of the provisions which regulated religion in New Hampshire as a matter of general welfare and public concern.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not know what the Senator refers to. The former provision in our constitution with relation to what is called the religious test is not in the existing constitution of New Hampshire.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from New Hampshire, if he had given as much attention to taking care of his own people and the preservation of their constitutional rights at home as he has in bestowing benevolence upon the people of Alabama, would understand better than he has just stated that while some religious tests for office have been, by amendment, taken out of the constitution of New Hampshire within latter days, yet the standard religious test relating to the regulation of public schools remains in that constitution.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not know what the Senator refers to just now.

Mr. MORGAN. I will read from article 7 of that constitution. After having laid down in articles 5 and 6 the right of the people to worship God and the manner in which they should proceed to worship Him and the manner in which public religious teaching should be conducted and the persons who might be permitted to conduct those teachings, in order to make these provisions secure against any interference by the Congress of the United States with this reserved and highly prized right in article 7, they say this:

> VII. The people of this State have the sole and exclusive right of governing themselves as a free, sovereign, and independent State, and do, and forever hereafter shall, exercise and enjoy every power, jurisdiction, and right pertaining thereto which is not or may not hereafter be by them expressly delegated to the United States of America in Congress assembled.

Mr. BLAIR. I understood the Senator to say that there was something in the constitution of New Hampshire in the nature of a religious test either for the right of suffrage or the holding of office, something that is not to be found in the constitutions of the States generally, and something inconsistent with absolute religious freedom. If I incorrectly understood the Senator, then there was no occasion for my interruption. If I did so understand him, I would say that there is at the present time nothing of the sort in our constitution. For a great many years, for half a century at least, before the formal repeal of the provision formerly in our constitution, it was a dead letter; and as I said once before on the floor of the Senate during my short service here when that matter was called up, I myself, some twelve or fourteen years ago, sat in the Legislature of New Hampshire side by side with an Irish Roman Catholic, a representative from the city of Manchester.

Mr. MORGAN. The right to hold office, from which Catholics were excluded by the original constitution of New Hampshire, has been conferred upon them by an amendment to that constitution. I have been unable to find, though reading the amendments down as late as 1877, which I presume was the date of the last amendment, any change in the language of this part of the constitution of New Hampshire, which I again read:

> Therefore, to promote those important purposes, the people of this State have a right to empower, and do hereby fully empower, the Legislature to authorize from time to time the several towns, parishes, bodies-corporate, or religious societies within this State to make adequate provision at their own expense for the support and maintenance of public Protestant teachers of piety, religion, and morality.

If that item has been stricken out of the constitution of New Hampshire it has been a very late thing.

Mr. BLAIR. We recognize the Catholic religion as a religion.

Mr. MORGAN. Not in your constitution.

Mr. BLAIR. I will not waste the time of the Senate on that point. I notice by the morning papers that a Roman Catholic diocese has just been established in New Hampshire by the appointment of the Pope.

Mr. MORGAN. That may be also, but can they teach, can they exercise the powers and functions of public teachers of piety and morality and religion which are prescribed and guaranteed in this article of the constitution, and which New Hampshire took very great pains to protect against the power of Congress to repeal it or to alter it in any way, by saying that "we claim this right as ours, and ours forever, and it having never been delegated to the Congress of the United States, we reserve that power to ourselves?"

I do not complain that New Hampshire took that view of the general welfare in her ordination of the organic law of her State; she had a perfect right to do it; and although I think that she pushed this question rather to an extremity, and although I am persuaded that New Hampshire still occupies constitutionally the ground that she took in 1792 upon this question, yet I concede to her that which she claims, and I deny to Congress the power to pass a law, though they may think it for the general welfare, which shall enact and provide that every man, Protestant, Catholic, Jew, or gentile, who wishes to teach the public of New Hampshire shall have the right to do it, that feature of her constitution to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. PIKE. The Senator will permit me to say that I think anybody in New Hampshire can worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience freely. The only trouble there is we do not worship quite as much as we ought to.

Mr. MORGAN. The right to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience freely is provided for, but the office of public teacher is still confided by the constitution of New Hampshire, if I understand it correctly, alone to persons who profess the Protestant religion. Am I right in that?

Mr. PIKE. I do not think there is any discrimination at all.

Mr. MORGAN. I only read from the constitution of New Hampshire. If it has become obsolete I am not responsible for that. That it may have become obsolete in the mind of one of her Senators is not perhaps a just remark to make, or an insinuation that I ought to make here; but still there stands the letter of it; I have read it to the Senate; it is unanswered, and the exclusion still exists, and no man who is a Catholic to-day has a right to teach in public the doctrines of morality and religion, according to the constitution of New Hampshire.

Mr. BLAIR. There was a time when there was something like an established system of religion, an established church, in New Hampshire, and the provision to which the Senator has reference now related to that; but for many years the voluntary system, as it is called, has been the only form of church establishment existing in that State, unless it may be that of the Catholic Church; and the provisions from which the Senator is reading, so far as they relate to the public teaching of religion, have no reference whatever to any existing order of things.

Mr. MORGAN. That means that the people of New Hampshire have got their own consent to disregard entirely the constitution under which they live, for here the constitution is. I protest again; I say New Hampshire had a perfect right to do this in her organic law; she can exclude Catholics if she chooses, Jews, or any other class of religionists from holding public office or from ministering in things sacred or things secular within the borders of her State, or from receiving any pay or compensation from the treasury of the State for their work. She has a perfect right to do all this; and although this provision is, in the mind of the Senators from that State, obsolete, and although they insist that what is called the voluntary system of free worship has been substituted by common consent in place of the former restricted and exclusive system, yet I would not dare, as a member of the Senate, to vote for a bill, upon my ideas or anybody's ideas of providing for the general welfare, to reform the constitution of New Hampshire so as to compel them to recognize, in point of law, that which they do in point of fact, the right of people to worship God and to teach the worship of God in such manner as their consciences may dictate.

There is another proposition that I bring to the attention of the Senators, that while the New Hampshire constitution is in this form, and while that State claims the protection of guarantees which were put in its own constitution against the power of Congress to provide for the general welfare so as to break down the right of the State to control her internal and domestic affairs—while these things remain in that form, I protest that there is no evidence before the Senate that the people of New Hampshire have ever surrendered to Congress the right to interfere in the management of their public schools, and I submit that we have no right to compel New Hampshire to do this.

Now, Mr. President, I think I have demonstrated from the history of the country that what we call "the general welfare," and which applies alike to the people of all the States and all the Territories of this great country, was divided out, in respect of the jurisdiction to provide for and control it, in laying the original foundations of this Government. A part of it was assigned to the States and a part of it to the Federal Government. I have quoted from the constitutions of various States existing at the time that the Federal Constitution was ordained, and some before that time, some since that time, and I could proceed to quote from the constitution of every State in the American Union of modern origin to show that the right to control the education of the people has been claimed always as belonging to the local jurisdiction, and not to the general or Federal jurisdiction.

When I have brought these facts together and contrasted them with the utter silence of the Federal Constitution on all questions like this, on all questions of a kindred character, I think I may assume upon the history of the country, as it is written in the great book of the law, that the law of the land is and has always been that the Congress of the United States (to use the accurate expression of the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] in his speech) has jurisdiction of "the general welfare" only to the extent of the powers granted to Congress in the Federal Constitution, and that the jurisdiction of "the general welfare," in every other respect, belongs to the local governments, called the States, or whatever they may be.

In connection with this observation and with this record of history which I have had the honor to lay before the Senate I will ask the Secretary to read the remarks of Mr. Madison upon the cod-fishery bill, made in 1792 in a debate in Congress on the passage of that bill. I wish to put these remarks of Mr. Madison in this record as being the contemporaneous exposition of one of the greatest men who was in the convention that framed the Federal Constitution, and one who was most familiarly informed of every principle that was brought into discussion at the time the Constitution of the United States was framed, because I think from such contemporaneous exposition we get far more light than we possibly can from the refinements even of the ablest lawyers made at this day and time.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. MADISON. It is supposed by some gentlemen that Congress have authority not only to grant bounties in the sense here used, merely as a commutation for drawback, but even to grant them under a power by virtue of which they may do anything which they may think conducive to the general welfare. This, sir, in my mind raises the important and fundamental question whether the general terms which have been cited are to be considered as a sort of caption or general description of the specified powers, and as having no further meaning and giving no further powers than what is found in that specification, or as an abstract and indefinite delegation of power extending to all cases whatever; to all such at least as will admit the application of money, which is giving as much latitude as any government could well desire.

I, sir, have always conceived—I believed those who proposed the Constitution conceived—it is still more fully known and more material to observe that those who ratified the Constitution conceived that this is not an indefinite government, deriving its powers from the general terms prefixed to the specified powers, but a limited government tied down to the specified powers, which explain and define the general terms.

It is to be recollected that the terms "common defense and general welfare" as here used are not novel terms first introduced into this Constitution. They are terms familiar in their construction and well known to the people of America. They are repeatedly found in the old Articles of Confederation, where, although they are susceptible of as great a latitude as can be given them by the context here, it was never supposed or pretended that they conveyed any such powers as are now assigned to them. On the contrary, it was always considered clear and certain that the old Congress was limited to the enumerated powers, and that the enumeration limited and explained the general terms. I ask the gentlemen themselves, whether it was ever supposed or suspected that the old Congress could give away the money of the States in bounties to encourage agriculture, or for any other purpose they pleased. If such a power had been possessed by anybody, it would have been much less impotent, or have borne a very different character from that universally ascribed to it.

The novel idea now annexed to those terms and never before entertained by the friends or enemies of the Government will have a further consequence, which can not have been taken into the view of the gentleman. Their construction would not only give Congress the complete legislative power I have stated; it would do more, it would supersede all the restrictions understood at present to lie in their power with respect to a judiciary. It would put it in the power of Congress to establish courts throughout the United States, with cognizance of suits between citizen and citizen, and in all cases whatsoever.

This, sir, seems to be demonstrable; for if the clause in question really authorizes Congress to do whatever they think fit, provided it be for the general welfare, of which they are to judge, and money can be applied to it, Congress must have power to create and support a judiciary establishment with a jurisdiction extending to all cases, favorable in their opinion to the general welfare, in the same manner as they have power to pass laws and apply money providing in any other way for the general welfare. I shall be reminded, perhaps, that according to the terms of the Constitution the judicial power is to extend to certain cases only, not to all cases. But this circumstance can have no effect in the argument, it being presupposed by the gentlemen that the specification of certain objects does not limit the import of the general terms. Taking these terms as an abstract and indefinite grant of power, they comprise all the objects of legislative regulations, as well such as fall under the judiciary article in the Constitution as those falling immediately under the legislative article, and if the partial enumeration of objects in the legislative article does not, as these gentlemen contend, limit the general power, neither will it be limited by the partial enumeration of objects in the judiciary article.

There are consequences, sir, still more extensive, which, as they follow clearly from the doctrine combated, must either be admitted, or the doctrine must be given up. If Congress can employ money indefinitely to the general welfare, and are the sole and supreme judges of the general welfare, they may take the care of religion into their own hands; they may appoint teachers in every State, county, and parish, and pay them out of their public Treasury; they may take into their own hands the education of children, establishing in like manner schools throughout the Union; they may assume the provision for the poor; they may undertake the regulation of all roads other than post-roads; in short, everything, from the highest object of State legislation down to the most minute object of police, would be thrown under the power of Congress; for every object I have mentioned would admit of the application of money, and might be called, if Congress pleased, provisions for the general welfare.

The language held in various discussions of this House is a proof that the doctrine in question was never entertained by this body. Arguments wherever the subject would permit have constantly been drawn from the peculiar nature of this Government as limited to certain enumerated powers, instead of extending, like other governments, to all cases not particularly excepted. In a very late instance—I mean the debate on the representation bill—it must be remembered that an argument much used, particularly by gentlemen from Massachusetts, against the ratio of 1 for 30,000 was that this Government was unlike the State governments, which had an indefinite variety of objects within their power; that it had a small number of objects only to attend to, and, therefore, that a smaller number of Representatives would be sufficient to administer it.

Arguments have been advanced to show that because, in the regulation of trade, indirect and eventual encouragement is given to manufacturers, therefore Congress have power to give money in direct bounties, or to grant it in any other way that would answer the same purpose. But surely, sir, there is a great and obvious difference, which it can not be necessary to enlarge upon. A duty laid on imported implements of husbandry would, in its operation, be an indirect tax on exported produce: but will any one say that by virtue of a mere power to lay duties on imports Congress might go directly to the produce or implements of agriculture or to the articles exported. It is true, duties on exports are expressly prohibited; but if there were no article forbidding them, a power directly to tax exports could never be deduced from a power to tax imports, although such a power might indirectly and incidentally affect exports.

In short, sir, without going further into the subject, which I should not have here touched at all but for the reasons already mentioned, I venture to declare it as my opinion that were the power of Congress to be established in the latitude contended for it would subvert the very foundations and transmute the very nature of the limited government established by the people of America; and what inferences might be drawn or what consequences ensue from such a step it is incumbent on us all to consider.

Mr. MORGAN. When Mr. Madison delivered that speech on the cod-fisheries bill he was in the atmosphere of the then current facts of history to which I have just been calling the attention of the Senate. He did not think that it was necessary to bring out that history which was so recent and so fresh in the minds of all the legislators of that time in order to vindicate the position which he announced to Congress with so much force and so much earnestness upon that occasion. I have brought forward that history not that the Senate has been unmindful of it, but to refresh the recollection of the Senate and of the country upon the facts of the case and to give force and efficiency by this re-enumeration of these facts to the profound and earnest remarks of Mr. Madison delivered on that occasion, in which he felt, and stated that he felt, that the latitudinarian construction which is given to the term "general welfare" in this very debate would if indulged in upturn the very foundation of the Constitution of the United States. Senators must excuse me if I am not prepared to follow them in their interpretations of this instrument to the extent of voting for this bill after the enunciations of Mr. Madison upon that question, and after the Government of the United States from the date of that speech and before that time down to the present moment, has never resorted to the taxation of the people of the United States at large for the purpose of educating the children in any of the States. I can not follow them because of my doubts upon the question, if I may call them doubts. My views of the question are solid and earnest convictions against the constitutional power; but if I had only doubts, and they were enforced as they are by the judgment of a man like Mr. Madison, who was in the constitutional convention and who was in Congress speaking of powers—those reserved and those given to the Federal Government—if I was only left in doubt, under these circumstances would it be expected of me that I would do like the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] said he would do, resolve his doubts in favor of the poor and the humble and the needy and the oppressed?

We have a daily and an hourly chance to resolve all doubts in favor of that class, for the Scriptures tell us, "For the poor ye always have with you." We are never separated from them. No community, however great or prosperous, is ever free from a class who must depend upon public charity; but, as was so well observed by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD], what do the people of California know about the charity that should be exercised in behalf of the people of Maine, and what do the people of New Hampshire know of the charity needed to be expended through governmental institutions and laws in behalf of the people of the State of Alabama?

Sir, our commissions as Senators from these respective States do not include the right to consider questions of this kind; and there being so much of doubt, to say the least of it so much of uncertainty, in respect to the exercise of this power, it seems to me that it is our duty to each other as well as to the country to stop until the people can amend this Constitution if they think that the calamitous condition of illiteracy and ignorance in the country is so great and so pressing and so dangerous as that some public measure must be taken by Congress to aid in its improvement.

The annexation of Louisiana was alluded to here, and the waiver by Mr. Jefferson of his earnest, strong, conservative views of strict construction of the Constitution in order to carry that measure into effect. The Senate will remember, however, that Mr. Jefferson, after the measure had passed, after the treaty had been made, and while Congress was in the act of accepting it and providing for the extension of our laws over that territory, still earnestly urged that the States should take the matter in hand and amend the Constitution so that nunc pro tunc it would operate to cover the breach which had been committed as a matter of great public exigency.

The power of amendment was put in the Constitution of the United States, and we have a right to suppose that the Legislatures of the thirty-eight States of this Union will have as much wisdom in clearing up doubtful questions as any one Senate or any one House of Representatives may be expected to have upon constitutional law; and if by the emancipation of the negroes, or if by the influx of uneducated and poverty-stricken foreign population, or if by any other means there has been a growth of ignorance and illiteracy in this country the mastery of which is not within the powers of the local governments in certain places and quarters, let us when we recognize that evil and doubt the power which we have to remedy it, or when we find our compeers in this body honestly and seriously doubting our power to reach the question, let us take pause and refer the subject to the amending power of the State Legislatures over the Constitution of the United States. If we had more frequent resort to that remedy and could more frequently test the sense of the people of the different States of this Union in respect to the exercise of doubtful constitutional powers we should take a course which would conserve this Government in future against this friction and attrition which some time or other may tear it to pieces in spite of all the conservatism and wisdom of the best men we have.

Congress, autocratic and arbitrary in the execution of its powers, disdains to leave questions to States and to the people in order to ascertain what is their sovereign will upon those great questions of controverted powers on the part of the Government of the United States about which their representatives in both Houses differ so essentially.

I here leave this constitutional question. I have not ventured into the discussion of the letter and terms of the Constitution in respect to the powers of taxation connected with the general welfare and the common defense, for the reason that the able argument made by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] was so clear and so unanswerable, it seems to me, that it would be a mere waste of time and words for me to attempt to add anything to its force or its effect. I stand upon that argument, adopting it as fully and completely as if I had had the honor or ability to utter it myself.

I have been taught that the gathering of power into the hands of Congress is among the most dangerous of the evils to which our form of government is liable. My experience in the Senate has only increased my apprehensions as to the prevalence of this evil purpose. We have done much in this direction, and I do not recall an instance in which Congress has refused to seize upon any power that the popular will has for the moment demanded that it should grasp to carry out a favorite object or to relieve against some stress of misfortune. In this course of dealing we have so emasculated the State governments that even they join in the prayer to Hercules for his help.

Sir, I was bred, I may say, a State-rights Democrat, having, however, come from a family none of whom belonged to that political affiliation, but having formed my opinions upon this subject as the growth of my youth and manhood from a study of the Constitution and the writings which claim to be proper expositions of that instrument. I therefore belong to that class of Democrats who are called State-rights Democrats, Democrats who insist upon the preservation of the reserved rights of the States against the aggression of Congress or of any other department of the Federal Government, believing that this reservation of rights and the protection of the reserved rights is essential to the maintenance of the welfare of the whole body-politic of this great country of ours.

But I have been led to observe and sometimes to remark that the wasting away of the powers and rights of the States is more due to their inactivity in their assertion, to their want of confidence in the ground upon which they stand in their assertion, to their neglect of their constitutional powers, privileges, and duties, to the abandonment of what belongs to the States, than even to the aggressive spirit of Congress or of any other department of the United States Government. We find States coming up here with resolutions from their General Assemblies, and we find Senators on this floor who are the embassadors of States rising in their places from day to day and claiming the protection and assistance of Congress whenever anything strikes the attention which Senators suppose may possibly give the States some slight inconvenience. Here, of late, tornadoes have been used as a means of appealing to the Congressional power to take away from the States their right and their duty of protecting their own people or their communities through the benevolent office of charity, which they would doubtless and have indeed exercised to all who have been troubled or afflicted. Cattle diseases spring up, overflows occur, and Congress is appealed to for help.

In May, 1874, there was an overflow that occurred in my State on the Tombigbee or the Black Warrior River, a small, narrow stream whose bottom-lands were not very extensive; and as soon as it was understood that some plantations had been inundated and some stock swept off the members of Congress then representing or claiming to represent that State brought in a bill to appropriate, I believe it was $400,000, for the relief of the people who had been overflowed by the Tombigbee and the Warrior Rivers, and the bill was passed. The general welfare of the whole State of Alabama and of the United States was a sufficient plea in apology for giving $400,000 at that time for the overflowed people in that portion of my State. The money was authorized to be expended in bacon and in flour and other food for human consumption. It was so expended. The overflow had passed away before the bill passed Congress and new crops were growing upon the land that Congress was providing for before the bill was signed by the President. Nevertheless the $400,000 went into public distribution in the State of Alabama; and it was distributed in the next October and November elections upon the highest points of the sand mountains throughout a large region of country where the people wanted what was called in that country "overflow bacon."

I can not get that picture out of my mind. There was the general welfare of the people invoked and with success to justify this political fraud; the money was voted, and the bacon was bought, and the politicians went around with their greasy hands and distributed it to the men who cast greasier ballots that they could not read, and in that way the general welfare was promoted! Men got rations of bacon to cast ballots that they could not read through the broad benevolence and the wonderful healing power of our acts of usurpation under what we call the general-welfare clause, and which has been aptly termed here "the blanket clause" of the Constitution; the clause that, in the name of the general welfare, is a safe cover for iniquities, as charity is a convenient mantle for other sins.

Congress legislates constantly with the intent to control the property, the business affairs, the morals, the manners, the sentiments of the country, so as to accomplish the purposes of a political party, instead of legislating for the liberties and material welfare of the great body of the people that we represent. Its legislation is fitful and often whimsical. It grants hundreds of millions of acres of land to railroads in obedience to a great clamor for public improvement and for immigration to the Pacific. It then stands by and allows those grantees to abuse their powers so long as they are enriching men of great influence and contribute to the support of a dominant party. When the people wake up to the injustice they are compelled thus to undergo, Congress turns about and in the most sudden and violent way tears the whole structure down and destroys all that it can lay its hands upon for the sake of the alleged "general welfare" and to answer the popular demand!

The general welfare is invoked in the first place for the purpose of making the donations, and after they have been made and the companies and individuals have grown enormously rich upon their proceeds, then you turn around and invoke the general welfare to tear the whole structure down, waste the property, cut up vested rights, destroy property rights of men and corporations, and all because there is a public clamor raised and a demand made that this excessive legislation shall be wiped out.

Congress has allowed the ulcer of Mormonism to eat into the body-politic in the Western Territories, and when the evils of the disease have become threatening it has cut up and destroyed the very vitals of civil liberty to get at the supposed root of the disease and to eradicate it. A bill is pending here now to revoke Territorial legislation, take away the right of suffrage, and take the ballot out of the hands of the people in Utah, notwithstanding they are educated people. We have laws to take the ballot out of the hands of the people as a punishment for crime, before they are convicted of criminal charges and accusations. This is another instance where the general welfare has been invoked, first to let them alone in the enjoyment of their alleged religious opinions and sentiments; and then it is invoked to tear them up as a civil community and to punish them as a religious community, to confiscate their church property, and to abolish what they claim to be their religion.

I do not think they can make such claims honestly and faithfully, but still they claim that they are a religious people. I am discussing now the question of the general-welfare power and how Congress swings it back and forth to answer its own demands and to respond to whatever may be fitful or whimsical in the demands of public sentiment as expressed through the newspapers and otherwise.

Congress has enfranchised the negro, and it has enacted many unconstitutional laws to protect him in the use of the ballot that it now claims he can not read or understand and therefore can not intelligently use. Let us look over the history of this legislation a little and see what Congress has not attempted to do for the purpose of giving the negro the ballot and of protecting him in the use of it, and not only the ballot but all other descriptions of what are termed civil rights, and how the United States Supreme Court has been called upon and has rendered decision after decision obliterating the acts you have passed here because they were violations of the Constitution. Sir, in times of public excitement, in times when popular opinion is strong and urgent in a certain direction, is it our experience that Congress is not entitled to be trusted in determining, for good and all, "what is the general welfare?" If it were not for the conservative opinions of the Supreme Court in correcting the decisions upon the general welfare made in this body we should have had a Constitution by this time that would have been so threadbare that no American who claimed the liberties of his fathers would have been reconciled to its further existence.

Congress first invites the black man from Virginia and Maryland and North Carolina and elsewhere through the United States to come into the District of Columbia. It confers upon him as an example of freedom and liberty the right to the ballot to be cast in common with the white men of this District—a District which has more population than several States of the American Union, and some of them old States; more, I believe, than Oregon; more, I know, than Colorado and Nevada; more, perhaps, than some of the other States, or if not more about as much—a great capital city, with vast amounts of property accumulated here, and old-established and sedate social institutions, with every appliance of order and law and social excellence and elevation with churches, school-houses, hospitals, all that pertains to the welfare of the rich and poor, with palatial residences, cottages, and tumble-down tenements, all occupying the same neighborhood with equal freedom and advantage of breathing the air of heaven to the occupants, all enjoying the right to pursue happiness in the manner their own judgment and conscience shall dictate, and to worship God according to the dictates of their conscience. Congress set the example of manhood suffrage in this District by giving the ballot to the negro, who came rushing into this District, where the fountains of liberty were supposed to flow perennially and always in crystal streams.

Drinking eagerly of their flood-tide beneath the Arcadian shades, the new worshipers of liberty knelt amidst the beautiful surroundings of this Capitol. This is a place to which the man of the highest taste would naturally be invited by its attractions, and the place to which the pilgrims in search of the realities of freedom came first to drink its intoxicating draughts of infinite delight. In troops they came, and what was the result? Congress, in order to get rid of them, in its fitful mood has abolished the suffrage in the District of Columbia for black and white. These noble Senators by whom I am surrounded, and some of whom own property in this District to the value of millions of dollars perhaps, those who live in palaces of which the kings of the earth might be proud, are willing that they themselves shall be disfranchised rather than they shall confer the power of the ballot upon their servants. They are willing to abandon that feature of republican government in the United States which involves the responsibility of rulers and public servants to the constituency that they serve. They are willing to forego everything in the nature of free government in which the individual man may participate in order to escape the doom that they see awaits them and their property if they allow the negro man to vote in the District of Columbia. Sir, they give up the ballot themselves and require the wisest and best of men in this District to yield up all rights of free government and participation in government, which is the only right of government they can enjoy—because they can not vote for President and Vice-President like the people of the States, they can not have representation in Congress, with a voice at these desks or in the other House to represent them by the voting power—they are yielding all this only for the purpose of getting rid of the ballot of the negro.

Was there ever, Mr. President, a stronger evidence of the fitfulness of legislation and its whimsicality, when the Congress of the United States, having the right to enact laws and the power to judge of the general welfare, declared, in the first instance, that every negro man 21 years of age who had been a resident of this District for a certain time should have a vote in the direction of its public affairs, and then afterward, when they had tested the evils of negro suffrage which this law directed, they abrogate the whole system of the ballot, deny the ballot to white and black, and say there shall be no free government in the District of Columbia, because they can not afford, inasmuch as they reside here and have got property in this District, to expose their property to the assaults of the ballot in the hands of the negro? These liberty-loving patriots could not consent to expose their interests to his control. They could not afford to stand the uplifting which perhaps the negro might gain in social position and equality here, and in order to rid themselves of this bête noire, in order to escape the doom which they had invoked upon themselves by their own doctrines and own enactments, they will simply retire from the privileges of American liberty and abjure their rights and privileges as citizens, and they will say to the Congress of the United States, "We do not want to vote at all."

Often when looking at that venerable man George Bancroft, and that other venerable, pure, and noble man Mr. Corcoran, and the savans and scientists, men of eminence, of historic fame, who have congregated about this capital in order to enjoy the association of men liberal in letters and large in means who congregate here to enjoy the repose and quietude of the evening of life in the presence of the opportunities which may be enjoyed here, I have thought how little confidence there is to be put in a Congress of the United States which would disfranchise men like these to escape the plain duty of putting the right of suffrage in this District upon grounds that are safe for the welfare of the people. I have nothing to say about the political hypocrisy of this act; it is not necessary that any man should comment upon the matter. That stands blazoned in shameful letters upon the history of the last ten years of the United States. Let the party which is responsible for it take up the subject and digest it, "put it in their pipes and smoke it," when they read lectures and homilies to me about the denial of the right of the ballot to negroes in my State, or complain at my refusal of their proffered largesses when they say that they want to educate the negroes that we have among us so as to qualify them for suffrage in the States.

How many negroes, Africans, ex-Africans, part Africans are there in the District of Columbia who are esteemed by honorable gentlemen here to-day as among the most elevated men in morals, in character, and in attainments in the world? There are many such, sir. We send some of them abroad on foreign missions and others we confirm to high offices in the secret sessions of this body; and the Senators who have been here with me for seven years know how I have stood upon these questions, and that my conduct has been marked by entire generosity and liberality upon that score. But reviewing our own conduct and the presence and the situation of these men among us, can we deny that they have intelligence enough to read the ballots which they cast in the box and understand the principles of government for which they would vote? They can mount the rostrum and deliver lectures to us upon governmental affairs which would instruct the best of us, perhaps, and yet we deny them the ballot; while we claim that it is necessary in order that the negroes in the States shall have the qualifications to vote to spend $105,000,000 at the first move to educate them to the proper use of the ballot. Let us first extract the beam that is in our own eye, that we may see more clearly how to take the mote out of our neighbor's eye.

Mr. President, I do not recur to this in any political sense, for I have determined to keep out of this debate so far as I could political allusions and references. The debate has been conducted upon very high principles, and so far as I am concerned I desire that it shall continue in the same line and upon the same plane. I know the Senate is prepared now to hear from a Southern Senator something of his views in respect to the present status of the negro and what we can accomplish for him by spending $105,000,000 chiefly and mainly if not entirely for the purpose of educating him so that he can read the ballot that he casts and can understand some of the principles of the Government in reference to which he is exercising the franchise of a voter.

In the convention that framed the Constitution of the United States the negro was a source of the greatest bitterness of feeling, and from that day to this his presence in the United States has caused nothing but strife and bloodshed. I say "nothing;" I will qualify that remark; it has cost great strife and much bloodshed. The negro has been very much more the beneficiary of all that he has received and all that has been done to him and for him in the United States than the people with whom he has been associated. Now he is a citizen. I respect him and his rights as such, and I am willing to do for him as a citizen what I would do for any other citizen of the United States. But in that character his rights are no greater than mine and no greater than the rights of my family. His ignorance and his vices are a heritage from a savage ancestry.

Up to the year 1860 no man thought it necessary that the power of Congress should be invoked for the purpose of educating the children of the men who fought through the war of the Revolution, or the war of 1812, or the war with Mexico, even of those children who were left orphaned.

Sir, allow me to ask you whether you are conscious of the fact that the people of the United States have any higher grade of personal or political morality now than they had in the year 1800? Do we show better evidences of enlightenment and civilization or better fruits of cultivation now than our fathers did at the beginning of this century? Who built the Constitution we are discussing to-day, which has been pronounced the world over as the masterpiece of a single effort of constitutional ordination? Men from communities where there were scarcely any public schools, to say nothing of governments to foster and sustain them—men came forth from the wilderness, some of whom as compared with what we pretend to know in this day and hour would be called ignorant. How did they compare with our educated generations? They organized the Government and put it on foot; they voted for President after President, and they decorated the history of the United States with a roll of great men which century after century to come will never dare the enterprise of emulating. The Government went on in its operations, not ignorantly, not unwisely, not inconsiderately. It went on with beautiful power and smoothness of action and strength to build up the people within its limits and to establish a character for it among the nations of the earth that has been enjoyed by no human government that ever existed in the annals of history. Yet they had a comparatively uneducated basis of population, and there were thousands and tens of thousands of voters who could not have read the ballots that they cast in the boxes when the most renowned of our Presidents and other men of the past were elected to the high offices which they filled.

Sir, it is not the ignorance of the people in respect of letters that disqualifies them from the exercise of the powers of the franchise in this free government of ours, but it is the ignorance of the substantial virtues of patriotic manhood and it is the inattention to that sense of duty which after all is the anchorage of the individual and of the heart of the great public in any country.

Until 1868 there was not dumped in upon us an enormous mass of ignorant men just out of slavery who had no conception of our government and could not have had any power or capacity to understand it. That act, fortunately for the people of the United States, though well intended merely to amplify the powers of the few white men who might be placed in control of this great mass of ignorance, has not had the result of so vitiating or demoralizing the ballot or the elective power of this country as to sweep away the foundations of civil liberty and constitutional law; but, on the contrary, it turns out in the providence of God that the early teaching of these people in their new relations of citizens was left in the hands of men who had for them a personal regard founded upon long and intimate friendly association as master and slave; men who had a conscientious regard for the obligations which they take before Almighty God to obey the Constitution of their country. It was fortunate that they fell into the hands of a set of men who were scrupulous and guarded in reference to all political duties, and who believed and realized that their participation in the politics of the country was intended and designed only for the welfare of their families and the good of the people at large.

What has been the result? In the midst of poverty and distress and embarrassment of every moral and material character, in the midst of social distress of a most terrific nature, these people have coolly and quietly and calmly marched on in the line of duty until they have convinced the negroes themselves that they are upright and honest citizens, and that their purpose in participating in the government of the States and of the United States is to do good to all the people and not to do harm to any.

Through this moral heroism which pervaded all classes of the South, the men and the women too of the South, we have been enabled to give direction to political affairs there, so that instead of barbarism and ignorance capturing the country and destroying it, new life has sprung up, great accessions of strength have come to the people there, and I can state in the presence of this honorable Senate and the country to-day that there are no communities in the civilized world where law and order are better preserved, where justice is more thoroughly and more cheaply administered, where the taxation is so light. It is a country where the peace of society is so precious to the people, where honor and duty control in every relation of life from the family circle to the highest official rank and station, where the relation of parent and child is maintained with all that delicacy of sentiment and strength of union and harmony of purpose which belonged to the class of people who laid the foundations of our constitutional system and of our great social system in the United States.

The negro has been very greatly educated in letters since he was emancipated, and he has unlearned some lessons that he understood well at the time he was a slave, and the unlearning of which has cost his family very great trouble. Throwing off himself all idea of discipline, he has dismissed discipline from his home circle, and his little children have been allowed to grow up without that sort of parental control which at last lies at the foundation of all good society and all good government. If we should abolish the family relation in the United States and break the bands and scatter asunder the little congregations about the hearthstone, we would strike a blow at the Governments of the United States, State and Federal, which no power of statesmanship could ever redress or remedy.

But the negro, after his discipline ceased, ceased himself to be a disciplinarian, and he has allowed his family to grow up in idleness and unthrift to such a degree that every gentleman who is here now from the South understands me perfectly well when I assert that there is less to be expected from the young negro generation in the United States in its prospective contribution to the moral power, to the wisdom, to the social and political strength of this country than is to be expected from so many Arabs on the deserts of Egypt.

I do not speak these words reproachfully toward that race, for I can scarcely conceive how they could have done otherwise or better, having the responsibilities of family and state thrown upon them without any knowledge gained by experience of the duties that they were to perform to society and to the State. I speak of this matter more with the feeling of one who despairs of furnishing an adequate remedy for an evil than I do in the sense of complaining of that race of men for their inefficiency in personal government or as a factor in the political government of the country.

Still they have improved in book knowledge, many of them. How much it has improved their morality, how much it has improved their usefulness to society, I hardly dare to contemplate; for, not among our people so much but in other sections of the United States, the Northern and Northwestern States and in the District of Columbia, it appears that that class of men have become the leaders in all the worst phases of crimes that are being committed. I would not dare to recount in the Senate Chamber, indeed, I could not with propriety recite in the presence of this assemblage, that which the men of that race who have had fifteen years to recover their manhood, if they lost it during slavery, are doing in the way of desperate crime. Many of them seem to have lost all idea of self-government and self-control, and they do not hesitate to assault society in its most delicate relations, and to destroy men, women, and children under the most cruel circumstances. I am not sure that the morality of the negro race has been one particle improved since their emancipation, and yet thousands and millions of dollars have been spent, south, north, east, and west, in their education. I believe that mere book learning is not the essential cure for the troubles which beset that race.

But let us suppose, for the sake of argument, that the negro family have been very greatly benefited by the assistance of the schoolmaster in the United States; let us take that more pleasant and encouraging view of this subject, and then let us attempt to realize what is his situation among the people of all sections of this country.

We find, as I have referred to the fact, that he is tabooed in the District of Columbia as a voter or a participant in political affairs, and every man who must be associated with him at the ballot-box is in like manner deprived of his privileges. What is his social condition here? Is it any better or any worse than it is in the State of Alabama? Is he a more independent man, a more self-respecting man, is he a better element of society, is he more recognized in social standing in the District of Columbia than he is in the State of Alabama? Surely not, sir. The negro in the District of Columbia is in the same groove precisely that he is in the State of Alabama. The whole family, from that woman who may have personal beauty and graces but who may be tinted with the slightest infusion of the blood of Africa in her veins, down to the blackest man who drives a dray through these streets, is equally excluded from all social recognition in this District by the white race. The negro in this District moves in the groove which he has selected, or which has been selected for him by society, or else by the decree of Almighty God. He belongs to a class, and that class is a caste in our society and in our politics. Do for him what we may, we have not the moral power or the political or physical power to elevate that man out of that groove.

It is not unnatural, neither is it to be considered a matter of surprise, that when all society turns the back of its hand upon the negro race and excludes them from fraternization at the hearthstone, they should become clannish, that they should unite with each other in political association, in churches, in schools, in society, and everywhere else. It is not to be wondered at that no alchemy has yet been found by which we could dissolve this close affiliation between the negroes in al the respects to which I have alluded.

Here he is in the United States, a man who is ranked at the very foot of our social relations. The Indian on the Western plains, though a savage and though a brute, revengeful, dangerous, but still proud and independent in his spirit, is rated by every white man in the United States as being socially the superior of the negro. The Indians also, in the earlier times in the Southern States, recognized that fact as distinctly as the white man, and many slaves belonging to the African race I have seen in the ownership of the Creek and the Cherokee Indians. They owned thousands of slaves, and they migrated them across the Mississippi among the five civilized tribes that now occupy that country.

We can not remedy this matter of caste by educating the negro. We can improve his condition as a man, qualified to take care of himself, to make money, to accumulate property around him, and all that, and in God's name let us do it, for we owe that to him as a duty of humanity whenever and wherever we can do it; but we owe him a very much higher duty than that if we can perform it, and that is to teach him the value of manhood and self-reliance.

Of what value to him or his race is a negro's manhood, his self-reliance, his talents, his capacities in the United States of America to-day? Of how many banks is he president? of how many railroads or other corporations is he manager? how many machines does he run by steam or by water power? What stocks does he own? what corporations does he manage? What business occupations is the negro found in except in keeping an apple-stand or something like that in the sheltered part of the highways in your cities? The progress he has made in these directions does not comport with the talents that belong to that family of people, nor with the education they possess, nor with their physical ability and industry, their capacity for labor, and their fidelity to the trusts which are reposed in them.

You may go to the great city of New York and look in vain for a cab-driver of the African family or a street-car driver. If you find a negro driver of a vehicle in the city of New York, he is mounted upon some private carriage with a pompon upon his hat and a uniform about him to indicate the servility of the man and the fact that he is simply a body servant. How is it in the streets of Washington? Which of these railroad companies dares to intrust the driving of a car upon your public streets in the hands of a negro? Not one. Why? Not because Southern people are here to be offended with such things, for we are not, but it is because the jealousy between the white race and the black in this District is so powerful that the railroad companies do not dare to give a negro employment in these public positions here.

Mr. BLAIR. They go in the more dignified capacity of passengers.

Mr. MORGAN. They do, and they do it with my hearty consent, and I ride by them with more ease and freedom than the Senator from New Hampshire does, for I have been raised among them and I have learned to know that they are good people in their hearts in the main; they have good instincts; they are polite and kind; they are good-hearted and good-natured. I have none of that jealousy toward them which crops out in all places and in all public procedure of every kind in the District of Columbia. I would not deny a negro the right to vote in the District of Columbia because I might be afraid that he would presume upon that privilege to come up into my parlor instead of going to my kitchen, as he does to visit some of the celebrated Republican politicians of this country. But I deplore the situation of that race in this country, and I am quite satisfied that it can not be remedied merely by adding to his education, because in adding to his education you increase his desire for higher and better associations and make him in the language of those who do not understand him properly a presumptuous and an intrusive man. You have tried it in the District of Columbia. The negroes in the District of Columbia are as well educated as the majority of the white people are in almost any of the older States of this Union. But of what avail is his education to him or of all that you can do for him, when with all that has been done by himself and by others for his advantage he still is down in the rut of caste and has no power to relieve himself?

I do not know that I have the wisdom or the sagacity to suggest a remedy for this difficulty. It is enough for me to know that the mere advantages of education are not sufficient to bring that man into that position socially or politically in this country which his talents would entitle him to if he could stand simply upon that foundation; but he is afflicted with a race objection, a caste belonging to his race, from the effects of which he can never recover in this land. He can not do it by intermarriage with the white family, for all the members of Congress that may live from now to the year 2000 or 3000 can not induce the women of this country to recognize the offspring of an African as being a person with whom they and their daughters can associate upon the terms of intimacy which belong to the family relation. We can not break that sentiment down if we chose to do it. We are not strong enough to do it and never will be.

I am not disposed to fly in the face of the decrees of Providence or to try to remedy them by Congressional acts. For my part I would rather give this people an opportunity to go to a land where they would be recognized not merely as equals but as superiors of their own race, and where the bounteous provisions of Almighty God, which he seems to have put under the seals of his providence for centuries past, which seals are being now just broken, may be utilized by the negro in the mastery and conduct of those great powers of commerce and government which will not merely contribute to his wealth and to his consequence and improvement in the world, but which will enable him to draw that race to which he belongs up into a civilization of which he and they and the world would be proud.

I am far from being satisfied that the negroes will avail themselves of such opportunities for growth as a race and for wealth as individuals. I would rather Congress would give $50,000,000 to establish a steam line between New York city, or Savannah, or Charleston, and the mouth of the Congo River than to have you give to the people of Alabama $100,000,000 to induce them to relax their efforts for the education of the communities by which they are surrounded and will be hereafter.

It is not for me to try to solve this great question. It is enough for me to say and to argue before the Senate of the United States that the expectations which Senators found upon the passage of this measure are totally mistaken. The fruits that they expect to gather from the expenditure of $105,000,000 in the education of the negroes will turn to ashes upon their lips and will be a source of extreme mortification and disappointment to the negroes themselves. I do not propose to colonize them in the Indian Territory or in Mexico or in Africa, but I do propose to let it be understood that the negroes of this country ought to exert themselves to utilize the advantages which they have, and if they find around them a barrier which is impervious to their efforts in the society where they are placed, let them, with that spirit of enterprise that ought to characterize men of ability, harness themselves for the great work of reaching out to a land where they can have importance and consequence, and where they can do good to themselves and to their fellow-men.

Alabama has been held up before the Senate of the United States as one of the States which has a very large percentage of illiteracy. The Senator from New Hampshire has prepared and laid before the Senate numbers of tables which are extracted from different official reports, some from the census reports and some from other quarters, in which there is portrayed a percentage of illiteracy to be found in the different States of the Union of people of the different educational ages. I hope the Senator will not be shocked if I should undertake to state upon my personal knowledge and observations that it is not true in respect of the people of Alabama that every fourth man or every fourth child that is above the age of 10 years is unable to read or write. Census reporters, gatherers of educational statistics, or any other set of men inquisitive about the affairs of the people of Alabama may present their views of this question in such light as may suit them; but I know (and when my voice reaches the people of Alabama it will be responded to by the people throughout that State as one man) it is not true that every fourth man, woman, and child above the age of 10 years in the State is incapable of reading and writing. The Senator from New Hampshire brought forward these statistics in the very best of faith and he doubtless believes them, but my life from a boy 8 years of age has been spent among the people where this large mass of illiteracy is said to exist; I know them intimately well; I know hundreds, yes, thousands of them by name, their place of residence and their family relations, and I never was more astounded in my life than when these statistics came to confront me in the Senate with the accusation against my people that one-fourth of them were incapable of reading and writing.

Sir, look at their prosperity under the circumstances of oppression which they have been compelled to meet. Look at the government you gave us after the war was over. Look at the satrapy that ruled us in Alabama. Look at the Freedmen's Bureau. Look at the carpet-bag government. Look at the robbery of the State treasury and the county treasuries. Consider the fact that the school fund raised by taxation out of our people was made the especial prey of these people, and that not one dollar in every five that was taxed out of the people for school purposes ever reached the school-house. Look at the turmoil and distress which visited our people, and compare these things with our prosperity. Does the Senator think I am a cruel-hearted man, that I am a revengeful man? Have I been here these seven years and have made no impression upon the individual Senators to the effect that I am at least a moderately humane and kind-hearted man? Yet even I can point you to a house that was set on fire on a November night, extinguished after the most terrible exertions, and afterward on three separate occasions riddled with bullet-holes that now display themselves there, the balls passing through the chambers of my sleeping children and cutting the bed-clothes above them, and all at the instigation of politicians who controlled the negroes. This was not done because I was in their way as a politician, but because they knew I had a voice to speak and the manhood to utter my sentiments and to proclaim the wrong that they inflicted upon our people.

Sir, I am not singular in this, but hundreds, yes, thousands of people in my State have suffered he same things. But still they have not been aroused like the people of Cincinnati, because of the failure of justice, to burn court-houses and destroy militia and in turn to get themselves destroyed by fifties. No, sir; that conservative feeling of which I have spoken, that self-reliance, that moral courage which looks to the end for the reward and is not afraid to march over the intervening ground to get justice and reap a harvest of right has sustained these people. They have not faltered while the negroes were massed together as a voting body, under the control of the worst men who could be selected—from Northern society, I was about to say, but I will not disgrace Northern society by supposing that they ever actually belonged to it or were recognized by it—and were used to work their pleasure on our people. These masses of men voted solidly always for the support of these outrages and wrongs and robberies, and yet the people of Alabama have come up through great tribulation with a sound constitution, with low taxation, with prosperous schools, to which we devote $500,000 a year and more. Out of a taxing power of $1,500,000 a year we give one-third of it to the education of the people, and the poll-tax which is levied in our State is levied upon the negroes and the whites, but all the poll-tax goes to the education fund.

Under circumstances of this sort I must be excused if I inform the Senate and the country that my State is calumniated by figures which are brought in by the Senator from New Hampshire; and while I have no personal resentment about it, I do deny it as a fact of history. I denounce it as being unjust to a great and a good people.

I observed on yesterday, about the time I was closing my remarks, that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] brought in an amendment to the bill, which he intimated he would press, in which he provides that the money to be expended under this bill shall be raised by a capitation-tax.

Mr. BUTLER. A direct tax.

Mr. MORGAN. A direct tax.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a capitation-tax.

Mr. MORGAN. A capitation-tax is a direct tax, but there may be direct taxes that are not capitation-taxes. I say it with all due deference to the greater wisdom of the Senator from Vermont. I will take it, however, as a capitation-tax for the purpose of illustrating a point that occurs to my mind in connection with the Senator's amendment. Here we are providing for "the general welfare," as is alleged, and in order to make ample provision for it, wanting to raise $105,000,000, I will suppose that we put on a capitation-tax which would be equal now to about $2 per capita upon all the people of the United States in the States, and that we set it apart in this bill for the purpose of educating the illiterate people, mainly the negroes, in the State of Alabama.

The constitution of the State of Alabama provides that a capitation-tax or a poll-tax, as it is called, may be levied there not to exceed a dollar and a half per capita. This capitation-tax in Alabama can only be levied for the purpose of maintaining the public schools. The fund thus derived can not be diverted to any other purpose whatsoever. That is a constitutional provision in Alabama—one that we can not violate there—and one I hope that the Congress of the United States can not violate, although Congress was kind enough on one occasion to give to the people of the State of Alabama a constitution which they voted down, and which was so reported to this body.

Suppose that for this purpose of public education, which is in aid of all the common schools of Alabama, with a bill drawn in the very language of that constitution, we put the capitation-tax at $5 per head upon the people of that State and the people of Massachusetts and Connecticut for the purpose of raising money to educate the illiterate in the State of Alabama and elsewhere, let me ask which of these two sovereigns is to be respected in the collection of that capitation-tax? The State of Alabama says that no capitation-tax shall be levied in that State to exceed a dollar and a half per capita, and that it shall only be levied for the purpose of public education. The United States Government comes in through its Congress and enacts a law which says that the capitation-tax in the State of Alabama and elsewhere shall be $5 per capita, and that the money thus raised shall only be devoted to the purpose of public education. Which is the sovereign in the collection of that tax? Will it be urged and argued here that both governments may go on to collect a tax of the same nature and upon the same subject and for the same purpose? Congress can collect a tax for the support of the Government of the United States by capitation levy, but can Congress collect a tax for the support of education in Alabama by a capitation-tax upon the people of Alabama and Massachusetts, which capitation-tax shall be twice or three times as much as that which the constitution of Alabama permits her legislation to levy for identically the same purpose?

Mr. President, there can be no partnership in sovereignties in this country. There are concurrent powers to be exercised by the Federal and the State Government, but when concurrent powers are being exercised the power of the United States in virtue of its supremacy over the States usurps the field and domain of legislative authority in such cases, and the power of the State falls. They can not be exercised in partnership or in common.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). Will the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. I am not now dealing with the constitutional question of the rightfulness of this exertion of authority, but I was interested in the Senator's statement of the impossibility of the joint taxation. I do not speak now of its differing in constitutional sanction, but does it differ in fact between the ordinary case of a State and a township? The township in my State raises its taxes for certain purposes, it may be for the support of common schools, and there may be a State tax levied upon the same people, levied among the towns for the same object if the State chooses to make an additional grant from the State to that raised by the towns. Now, supposing it were within the constitutional power of the State, what is the difficulty in the United States and the State doing the same thing?

Mr. MORGAN. The difficulty is in the mind of the Senator from Massachusetts, who does not appreciate the distinction between a Massachusetts town and the State. There is the difficulty. A State of the American Union has never been likened, in my recollection of affairs, to a township.

Mr. HOAR. If my friend will pardon me, I put my question in entire——

Mr. MORGAN. Good faith.

Mr. HOAR. Respect for the Senator's argument.

Mr. MORGAN. I know.

Mr. HOAR. Because I am exceedingly interested, as I have often been, in his legal distinctions.

Mr. MORGAN. But the Senator from Massachusetts brings up a supposed analogy between a Massachusetts town and the State.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, if I am not trespassing upon his courtesy too much——

Mr. MORGAN. Not at all.

Mr. HOAR. I understood the Senator to say in speaking as to whether the United States Constitution had given us a certain power or not, that the two powers were incapable of concurrent exertion by different authorities; that it could not be as a matter of possibility that there should be one lawful power, the State, and another lawful power, the United States, imposing for the same purpose upon the same people a tax of the same character. I ask in reply, are there not very common instances of just that thing in States and towns, not that the State does not differ from the United States, not that the town does not differ from the State, but that the actual and practical thing is concurrently done by two bodies entirely different. If that be true, why can it not be done? Suppose, in other words, there were written expressly in the United States Constitution what some of the Senators on the other side of the Chamber imply there: "The United States shall have the authority to assess a capitation-tax for the sake of aiding popular education in the States;" is it not entirely possible that the United States and the States could both exercise that power if that were there?

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Massachusetts might have put a very much stronger case to me than the one he has, because there is really no analogy between the relation of States to the Federal Government and the relation of towns in Massachusetts to the State government. The towns in Massachusetts have not sovereignty in any sense of the word. The States have sovereignty in many senses, and where in virtue of their sovereignty they have concurrent powers with the Federal Government, as I confess they have in many cases, the two powers, operating through their respective agencies, are supplied and supported from their respective treasuries in doing a particular work, I will say. The position that I took was that there could not be any partnership between them, but that in that case it belonged to the United States Government, in consequence of its supremacy, to assume the control at its will and pleasure, and to exclude the inferior sovereignty from any participation in that work whatsoever.

I will illustrate by a case that occurred in the Supreme Court of the United States in which I was of counsel. The State of Alabama voted probably $200,000 for the purpose of dredging in the Bay of Mobile. Its agents went to work upon lines of survey that had been established by the United States Government before that time. After that time the United States Government made an appropriation, and they went to work upon the same field and upon the same survey. The question arose whether the act of the Legislature of Alabama was constitutional under the constitution of that State, inasmuch as it related to a work that had been surveyed and might be done by the Government of the United States. The result of the action, without proceeding to give all of its features, was this: The Supreme Court held that the United States had the right of access to that harbor at any time for the carrying on of the work, and it might usurp or take all the work into its own hands and expel the State from any participation in it in virtue of its supremacy and in virtue of its jurisdiction to improve the harbor, and that therefore the State might proceed until the Government of the United States undertook the work or indicated its determination through an act of Congress to undertake the work. There was a clear line of demarkation drawn between the power of the United States in a given area of territory to do a certain thing and the power of the State to do it. Either might do it in the absence of the other, but when the powers came together they could not be consorted, they could not be formed into a joint or united power, but the supremacy of the United States would necessarily expel the inferior sovereignty from the ground whenever it chose to do so.

Hence I assert again as my conviction that if a poll-tax is levied for the purpose of educating the people of Alabama in the common schools of that State by the Congress of the United States, and a poll-tax is levied by the State of Alabama for the same purpose and upon the same people, and the United States poll-tax is $5 while the constitutional poll-tax in Alabama is a dollar and a half, when the United States exercises its authority to provide money through a capitation-tax for the education of the people in the State of Alabama in their common schools, that State could never after that collect its own tax. The United States would usurp the power; its supremacy would establish the $5 poll-tax, if it was constitutional, as being the tax to which the people of Alabama must yield and which they must pay.

Hence I argue, and I think I do it rightfully, that the Government of the United States can not levy a poll-tax in the State of Alabama for the purposes of education; neither can they levy it in the State of Massachusetts; and more particularly do I argue that the people of Massachusetts who are to be taxed, not according to their property, but according to their numbers, can not be by the Congress of the United States made liable to a capitation-tax to educate the people of a richer community who may have no such numbers. I will take the people of Colorado, who are very rich in mines and in their land-holdings and in their new properties of various descriptions in comparison with their numbers. I will also take the people of the State of New York, who are very rich; but the New York people amount to 5,000,000 and more, while the people of Colorado, I believe, amount to not quite 200,000. You levy a capitation-tax on New York of a dollar, and you raise $5,000,000 or more in New York by capitation-tax. When you come to distribute it under your bill and you select illiteracy as the basis of distribution and count the Indians in, if you want to, or you may select population as the basis of distribution, or any basis you please under the general-welfare clause as interpreted by Senators on this floor—when you come to distribute the $5,000,000 you have taxed out of the people of New York in the State of Colorado upon any basis that you choose to select you destroy the uniformity of taxation and rob a poorer people to enrich a wealthier community. A presentation of the absurdity of that proposition as it addresses itself to our sense of justice and of right would be enough, it seems to me, to convince any man at least of the doubtfulness of our constitutional power to inflict such an act as that upon the country.

Whether we resort to the public land sales, whether we resort to money taxed out of the people under the tariff or under the excise laws, or whether we shall resort to a direct tax, a capitation-tax, there is no view of this case in which it can be justified, in my opinion, that Congress shall step outside of the boundaries of its jurisdiction, as defined in the great body and volume of the Constitution of the United States, to raise money for purposes none of which are referred to in the body of that instrument. The recitals of that instrument are as dumb as Egyptian history in respect of education or any of the other benevolences that we are trying to execute through the enlargement of the general-welfare clause in our Constitution.

I will devote a very few moments to the consideration of the items of this bill for the purpose of showing that Senators on this side of the Chamber are mistaken when they suppose that the bill does not interfere with the disposal of these funds after they shall have reached the State. I will take this provision first:

> SEC. 12. That any State in which the number of persons 10 years of age and upward who can not write is not over 5 per cent. of the whole population thereof, shall have the right to receive its allotment and to apply the same for the promotion of common-school and industrial education, or the education of teachers therein, in such way as the Legislature of such State shall provide.

Those States which have not an illiteracy in excess of 5 per cent. of the entire population can dispose of this money in such a manner as the Legislature of such State shall provide; but how is it with those States that have an excess of 5 per cent. of illiteracy? They must dispose of it in the manner prescribed in the bill. What else is this but a declaration on the part of Congress that in some States it has the right to dispose of this fund as Congress may declare, whereas other States that have not got 5 per cent. of illiteracy or above that rate may dispose of this money in such a way as the Legislature of each State may provide? Why does the bill give to the State of Massachusetts a right to dispose of this money in such a way as the Legislature may provide, and deny to the State of Alabama the right to dispose of the money in such a way as its Legislature may provide? The discrimination, of course, is based upon the idea that Massachusetts does not need the money, but involved in that discrimination, by the necessity of the very words in which it is couched, is found the proposition advanced in the bill that Congress may discriminate between the States, giving to the one the absolute right of disposal of the money as its Legislature may provide and giving to the other the right to dispose of it only in the manner and upon the terms and conditions prescribed in the act. Senators are mistaken when they conceive that the power of disposal of the money is not retained in the hands of Congress.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAIR. I only wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the limitation to the general purpose applies to all the States. The section which he has read gives to the State which has not an excess of 5 per cent. of the whole population thereof "the right to receive its allotment and to apply the same for the promotion of common schools and industrial education, or the education of teachers therein, in such way as the Legislature of such State shall provide." You will observe that the purpose is the same.

I wish to suggest to the Senator that the idea is not (at least it was not in the minds of the committee) that the States to which the smaller apportionment is made do not really need and ought not to expend the money. It is to be assumed that if they need it they would raise it themselves. The necessities of education exist in all the States to a much larger extent than the provision to supply those necessities is made. There is no State in the Union (at least that is my own personal view in regard to it) that comes nearly up to really a proper standard of its duty with reference to the education of its children, not Massachusetts herself even. There is no State that can put on any special airs of complacency over its well-doing in this regard comparatively or absolutely. I wish to say, as long as I am permitted to interrupt the Senator, that there is no special occasion for any person in this country to claim that it is tendering a charity or doing a benevolence toward any other section of this Union, nor on the part of any portion of the country to place itself in the attitude of a receiver of benefits or favors from the Government at large.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not complain of the discrimination that is made in the bill for economic reasons or because of any supposed injustice that might result to my State or any other State, but I call attention to the fact that Congress in this enactment claims the power, the right, to discriminate, to put duties and conditions upon one State that it does not upon another, and the more important fact thus clearly disclosed that the bill in terms concedes to Congress the power to control the expenditure after the money has reached the States.

When we endowed the agricultural colleges in 1862 the fund was given entirely into the hands of the States for their management. Why has not that been done in this bill? How much character have the States of the South lost in the administration of the educational fund applied to agricultural colleges? Have we not done our duty? Have we not built up flourishing institutions upon those funds? Have we not honestly administered the fund in every particular? Have not the scholars who have come from those institutions been men who have served the country well in various capacities? I know some of them now from the agricultural college in my State who are here in this city serving the Government of the United States even with distinction. A young man who attended the expedition in the search for Greely, the young sergeant who stepped from the deck of that ship and after having done his work put up his photographic instruments and took a photograph of the ship as she sank through the ice, was a graduate of the agricultural college at Auburn, Ala., who came here and joined the Signal Service, and was assigned to duty upon one of those ships. The State of Alabama has had her way with that fund, and she has managed it discreetly and well, notwithstanding the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], who I regret is not in his seat, thought that Alabama and her sister Southern States would not do to trust in the administration of this fund. There stands the record in respect to the agricultural colleges to disabuse his apprehensions as well as to refute his insinuations and to relieve us from their weight.

I do not care whether that Senator has a good opinion of us or not. I will say nothing that might be offensive in his absence, but perhaps it would not be unkind in me to say that the people of Alabama thoroughly reciprocate the exhibition of feeling that he made towards the States of the South on this floor. They remember that he has said upon the floor of the Senate that anything was justifiable in morals and in law that will break down the Democratic party and build up the Republican party. After that declaration from so eminent a man we are not chagrined that he appears to have a bad opinion of us in any respect. I appeal to the record of the agricultural colleges to show that if the Congress of the United States intends to make a donation of money out of the Treasury to the Southern States for the assistance of the education of the negro, there is no reason in the history of the past to doubt that we shall make an honest, faithful, wise, and just disposition of the money.

This discrimination, I repeat, I do not complain of, because it may intimate that some of the States which have a large illiteracy must still be kept in check-lines in their management of this fund under the guidance of Congress. What I complain of is the exercise of the power by Congress in this bill to follow that fund after it has been donated and the power to call the States to the bar of the Senate, year after year, upon their reports for the judgment of this body and the other House upon their conduct.

I do not wish to see the proud State of Alabama arraigned at the bar of the Senate of the United States to answer how she has disposed of money, come from what source it may, in the discharge of a duty which she owes to her own citizenship. I would as soon have suspected my own mother of infidelity to the claims of her children upon her natural affections as to suspect the State of Alabama in the administration of any fund left in her charge for the benefit of her people. No, sir; her record is immaculate, and the only stain upon the history of Alabama that Almighty God has ever allowed to rest upon her escutcheon is that which has been planted by negro suffrage, placed by the gentlemen in this Chamber on the other side in the hands of the agents of this Government to go there and pollute and corrupt the fountains of justice and the whole record of the history of that State. Besides that her record is immaculate, her honor is untarnished, her fame is above reproach. When your ships lay barricading the ports of Mobile and of all the South and navies floated there to guard the exit and the entrance to our ports, the State of Alabama, while she did not have money to buy quinine for her sick or spinning-wheels for her women to make thread to weave cloth upon their looms for their children, and while the blistering sands of the fields were burning the naked feet of the women who followed the plow through the furrows to make corn for the soldiers, for husband, and for children distant in the war, Alabama collected gold out of her people, and she ran the blockade with it, and she paid the interest on her public debt punctually in London during the whole period of the war. No State of the American Union or in the universe ever before exhibited a more honest and conscientious regard for duty than that State has done. God knows I rejoice in her fame.

After our property had been destroyed, our homes devastated, our men buried, and our women and children in orphanage turned off for self-support in the best way that they could, you imposed the negro ballot upon us, and now you claim that the negro can not read his ballot. For fifteen years he has been voting a ballot that he could not read. He has been voting always with your party; he votes with it yet. Do you propose to dismiss him from your party by teaching him how to read his ballot, or do you propose to strengthen the hold of your party upon him by teaching him how to read the ballot? Your hold upon him is perfect, unrelaxing, permanent, unavoidable, and we know it. We submit to it. Only our superior intelligence, only the fact that we belong to a governing race of men to which you also belong prevents us from crouching beneath this consolidated power and having it to rule over us to the crushing out and ruin of every interest, social, moral, political, and material, that we possess. Sir, our fame is untarnished, our credit good at home and abroad. It is true that we have now a ten-million debt, six millions of which were put upon us by carpet-bag rule since the war.

It has often occurred to my mind during this debate that inasmuch as the general welfare—according to the contemplation of some Senators—allows the Congress of the United States to search about through all our domain for objects of bounty and beneficence, why it has never occurred to them that they should assume the State debts caused by carpet-bag rule, and pay the interest, upon condition that we would vote a similar sum to the education of the negroes, thereby vindicating themselves among the people who will read our history by trying to rectify the evil which they planted upon us in the shape of that enormous debt, and at the same time giving us the command of our resources in order that we may have a better opportunity to extricate ourselves.

Sir, can Congress assume these debts of these States? If not, why not, under the blanket-clause construction of the Constitution? Why can not Congress recognize the fact that this debt has been piled up upon the Southern States in fraud of their rights and in fraud of justice? If it can educate the negroes because they can not read the ballot, why can it not provide for this other great calamity of public debt which has been put upon us by the negroes because they could not read the ballots and because somebody else did the writing and consequently voted the ballot for them? Open the door as it is intended to be opened in this bill, and when we have got strength enough and skill enough and are sufficiently wanting in patriotism to consolidate ourselves with the balance-of-power party we can elect Presidents of the United States among Northern selections for the purpose of having these debts assumed and paid. But, sir, we will never engage in this wrong. I abdicate that authority and that power, so far as I am concerned, on behalf of the State of Alabama. I lay down all expectation of that kind, because I have an honest, sincere, and, I trust, a manly and proper regard for the people of the United States and the Constitution handed down to us by our fathers. I love it and I respect it and the men who ordained it. I revere all the grand principles embodied in it, and am proud of the beautiful and magnificent history which clusters about its progress in the civilization of this whole world; and, sir, I also revere it and I obey it because I have sworn to do so, and I must know in support of it that I am not doing a doubtful thing, but that I am doing by my vote that which I am authorized to do, or else the Senate must excuse me from taking that step.

I can not, Mr. President, get my consent to vote for this bill, because I honestly and sincerely believe that in doing so I should step outside the authority which I possess as a Senator from Alabama and I should violate my conscience.

Mr. RANSOM. Mr. President, I would not interrupt the speech of the Senator from Alabama when he made some allusion to North Carolina, and I now ask the attention of the Senator from Alabama to what I shall say.

The Senator from Alabama paid a grand tribute to the State of North Carolina, but in the conclusion of that tribute he thought proper to say, as I understood him, that "if her voice could be truly uttered upon the floor of the Senate, certain things would or would not occur."

I regret, Mr. President, to have to ask the Senator from Alabama if he contemplated by that expression that the voice of the State of North Carolina was not truly uttered upon the floor of the Senate by myself?

Mr. MORGAN. Well, Mr. President, I can say about that that the idea never occurred to me, until the Senator from North Carolina suggested it, that there could be any want of fidelity on the part of her Senators in uttering what they believe to be not only the voice of North Carolina, but what they believe to be for the best interests of that State and all the States. I was speaking about the voice of North Carolina of 1776, as uttered in her constitution, and I repeat that I think a true utterance of that voice as it was then intended would forbid the Congress of the United States from assuming jurisdiction over the schools of North Carolina. That is my opinion, at least. Of course, I did not intend, and never thought of attributing to the Senators from North Carolina, or either of the Senators, any want of fidelity in their views or any want of independence in their construction of their duty in this body.

Mr. RANSOM. Mr. President, I hoped that the Senator from Alabama could not so have intended, and I know now that he did not so intend; and I thank him, not only for the noble expression he used in reference to my State, but I also thank him for the prompt way in which he has removed the impression which I had, and when he reads his remarks he will see that he would have had, upon his statement in reference to North Carolina to which I have alluded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] to recommit the bill to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not know of any advantage there could possibly result from recommitting the bill to the committee. It is evident from the divergence of opinion here in the Senate that we shall not be able to cope with it in committee at all.

Mr. VEST. I ask for the yeas and nays on the pending motion.

The years and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent to interrupt the roll-call to make a statement. I was authorized by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], now absent from his seat, to withdraw this motion to recommit——

Mr. VEST. The motion was made by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. HOAR. He authorized me to withdraw it in order that the question might be taken first on the amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll-call can not be suspended except by unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. VEST. Let us take the vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

The roll-call was continued.

Mr. FRYE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON]. If he were here, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay" on this motion.

Mr. JONAS (when Mr. GIBSON'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. GIBSON] is paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER].

Mr. BUTLER (when Mr. HAMPTON'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. HAMPTON] is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] on this question, I understand. I do not know how either would vote on this motion.

Mr JONES, of Florida (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GEORGE (when Mr. LAMAR'S name was called). My colleague [Mr, LAMAR] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON]. If he were present, my colleague would vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ALDRICH. My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is absent and paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON]. My colleague, if present, would vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT). The Chair is paired with his colleague [Mr. HAWLEY] on some votes relating to this bill. He does not know how his colleague would vote, if present, on this motion, and therefore withholds his vote.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I wish to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER]. The Senator from New York, as I understand, would vote "nay" on this question. I do not know how the Senator from Delaware would vote, but I believe he would vote "yea," at least I am so informed.

Mr. MANDERSON. My colleague [Mr. VAN WYCK] is paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN].

Mr. FARLEY (after having voted in the affirmative). I withdraw my vote and announce my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN]. If he were present, I should vote "yea." I withdraw my vote.

Mr. BUTLER. Before the result is announced I think perhaps I had better recall my announcement as to the pair of my colleague [Mr. HAMPTON] with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY], for I think very likely from what I have heard since that they would vote together on this proposition, and perhaps it would be safer to pair my colleague with myself. I therefore withdraw my vote and announce my pair with him, simply stating that I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay." I think it quite likely from what I understood that the Senator from Rhode Island would vote "nay" also.

The result was announced—yeas 10, nays 35; as follows:

YEAS—10.

So the motion to recommit was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON], which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment is in section 8 to strike out all after the word "provided," in line 6, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That no greater part of the money appropriated under this act shall be paid out to any State or Territory in any one year than the sum expended out of its own revenues in the preceding year for the maintenance of common schools, not including the sums expended in the erection of school buildings.

Mr. HARRISON. It would be best perhaps that I should ask consent to withdraw that amendment. It embodies a proposition which is found also in the amendment I submitted later.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana is entitled to withdraw it, the yeas and nays not having been ordered and it not having been amended.

Mr. HARRISON. Then I do withdraw the amendment, and ask leave to submit in their order the amendments which I have proposed and which have been printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn. The question now recurs on the amendment to the same paragraph proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], which will be reported.

Mr. PLUMB. The amendments which the Senator from Indiana proposes to offer hereafter are of the same general purpose.

Mr. HARRISON. Precisely, only coupled with other things.

Mr. PLUMB. Then I withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas withdraws his amendment.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will first endeavor to ascertain whether there is any other amendment pending. [Examining the record.] The Chair believes that no other amendment is pending, but the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] gave notice that he would offer one changing phraseology.

Mr. BLAIR. I will not offer the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I desire now to move the first amendment of which I gave notice the other day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts proposes an amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed in section 8, line 8, after the words "which shall not," to insert:

Each preceding year have complied so far with the conditions hereof as is required for that year. Each State shall.

Mr. HOAR. That is not the one. I desire to have reported the amendment of which I gave notice and which was reprinted with the bill. It is, in section 1, line 3, to strike out "ten" and insert in lieu thereof the word "eight."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will first be reported.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to ask a question about which copy of the bill the Chief Clerk is reading from. From the last print?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. From the last print. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts in the last print will now be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 3, it is proposed to strike out the word "ten" and insert in lieu thereof the word "eight;" so as to read:

That for eight years next after the passage of this act, &c.

Mr. HOAR. If there be no objection, that and the next amendment may be put as one question, as they run together.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that his next amendment be read and considered and that the question be taken on his two amendments together. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The next amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 5, after the words "to wit," it is proposed to strike out all down to and including the words "shall cease," in line 11, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

The first year the sum of $7,000,000, the second year the sum of $10,000,000, the third year the sum of $15,000,000, the fourth year the sum of $13,000,000, the fifth year the sum of $11,000,000, the sixth year the sum of $9,000,000, the seventh year the sum of $7,000,000, the eighth year the sum of $5,000,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to these two amendments.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not desire to interfere with any arrangement that is made, but I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that prior to any amendment of this character being offered and submitted I offered an amendment and had it printed. I think at least that the proposition I offered has precedence over this amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I make no question about that. If the Senator prefers to have his amendment voted on first I have no objection, though his would be in order as an amendment to mine.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand that, but I would rather yours should be in order as an amendment to mine, inasmuch as mine was offered first. I have no disposition to interfere with anything, but I offered the amendment in good faith.

Mr. HOAR. Let the Senator's amendment be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair by the rules is obliged to recognize Senators as they rise and address the Chair, and the Senator from Massachusetts, having addressed the Chair, was recognized and made his motion to amend. The Chair has no authority to lay amendments before the Senate of which notice merely has been given, because Senators giving notice often change their minds. The Chair was obliged to recognize the Senator from Massachusetts, who offered his amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not complaining of the Chair having recognized the Senator from Massachusetts. I rose when the Senator had the floor and gave way to him as a matter of course; but I offered this amendment to the bill some time ago; it was printed, and I only now ask, this amendment being in order and having been offered first, that it shall be voted on first.

Mr. HOAR. I will waive any question about that. I have no choice, and therefore, as the Senator from Illinois has a choice, let him make it.

Mr. LOGAN. I do have a choice.

Mr. HOAR. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. VOORHEES. May I inquire of the Senator from Illinois and likewise the Senator from Massachusetts whether the amendments are exactly the same?

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; they are not. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is of the same character as the amendment I offered. It is almost a literal copy of it, except that the sums are different.

Mr. VOORHEES. Let the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] offers an amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out section 1 and insert in lieu thereof:

That for ten years next after the passage of this act there shall be annually appropriated, from the money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the following sums, to wit: The first year, the sum of $15,000,000; the second year, the sum of 17,500,000; the third year, the sum of $20,000,000; the fourth year, the sum of $18,000,000; the fifth year, the sum of $16,000,000; the sixth year, the sum of $14,000,000; the seventh year, the sum of $12,000,000; the eighth year, the sum of $10,000,000; the ninth year, the sum of $8,000,000; the tenth year, the sum of $6,000,000, ten annual appropriations in all, when appropriations under this act shall cease; which several sums shall be expended to secure the benefits of common-school education to all the children of the school age mentioned hereafter living in the United States.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not desire to discuss this amendment at any length, but merely to call the attention of the Senate to the proposition contained in it.

According to the statistics which we have there are about $80,000,000 expended per annum in the United States for common schools. If this bill is to be of any benefit whatever to this country and the bill is right in principle and the manner in which it is framed, we ought at least, if we appropriate money at all, to appropriate enough to do some good, and less than the amount appropriated in this bill will be, in my judgment, of but very little advantage to the country.

That is all I have to say in reference to it, except that I made a proposition in the Senate some time since in which I asked an appropriation of $60,000,000. That, of course, could not be considered by the committee having charge of this bill. Then I offered another proposition at this session of Congress asking that $50,000,000 be appropriated.

I do not wish to detain the Senate. I have examined the question somewhat, of course not so thoroughly as the Committee on Education and Labor. I have examined it sufficiently to satisfy myself that an appropriation less than is included in the amendment I have offered will be of some benefit, of course, but not sufficient to carry out the object intended by the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand the Senator's amendment does not change the basis of distribution.

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But that it increases the amount.

Mr. LOGAN. I propose instead of commencing at $15,000,000 and running down, to commence and run up half the time, and then go on the down scale the rest of the time until it ceases at $6,000,000, with an appropriation which I believe will accomplish something, running it up to $20,000,000 and then down the scale to $6,000,000. I think that is a good basis, because I think if anything is to be accomplished it will be by appropriating sufficient to secure some good. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. MORGAN. How much is the aggregate?

Mr. LOGAN. One hundred and thirty-six million five hundred thousand dollars is the whole aggregate in my amendment for the ten years.

Mr. BLAIR. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARLAND in the chair). The amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment of Mr. LOGAN.

Mr. BLAIR. I only wish to say that so far as I am personally concerned I believe that the views expressed by the Senator from Illinois are correct. I would be glad to see the bill amended in the manner indicated in his proposition. I have thought that, although the efficiency and the benefit to be derived under the bill would be largely increased if the sum were raised in the manner indicated; nevertheless perhaps, in the existing sentiment of this body, it might be less probable that we should succeed in the ultimate passage of the bill if this amendment were adopted than if it were rejected. If I fail to vote for this amendment, it is only for the reason that I think it may possibly endanger the final result. The amendment in my judgment is in the right direction.

Mr. HALE. What is the aggregate?

Mr. BLAIR. The aggregate under this amendment in ten years would be $136,500,000. By the bill itself during the same time it would be $105,000,000.

Mr. HALE. About $31,000,000 more?

Mr. BLAIR. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN].

Mr. PLUMB. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire, as he has some doubt about the effect the amendment would have on the bill, if he does not think double the amount would make the bill that much stronger—stronger in the ratio of the amount proposed to be appropriated. I suggest whether the Senator from Illinois would not accommodate the rising feeling of the Senate on that subject by simply putting in a much larger sum, and thereby making the measure more attractive.

Mr. BLAIR. I admit that by increasing the amount of the appropriation, its faithful application being understood in the one case as well as in the other, the benefit would be increased; but I think I have a wholesome consideration for the necessities that may yet arise in looking after the other wants of the country, and wish to save money for those purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LOGAN. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRYE (when his name was called). I was paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON]. I have transferred that pair to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL], and I will vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I am paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MAXEY. My colleague [Mr. COKE] would vote "nay" also.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] has been paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. GEORGE. My colleague [Mr. LAMAR] is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON].

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. INGALLS] is detained from the Chamber by illness.

The result was announced—yeas 2, nays 47; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LOGAN. I rise now to offer another amendment to the bill. I move to add the following as an additional section:

SEC. —. That there shall be appropriated and set apart the sum of $2,000,000, which shall be allotted to the several States and Territories on the same basis as the moneys appropriated in the first section, which shall be known as the common-school fund, to be paid out annually to each State and Territory at the end of the year on proof of the expenditure made during such year, which shall be expended for the erection and construction of school-houses for the use and occupation of the pupils attending the common schools in the sparsely populated districts thereof where the local communities shall be comparatively unable to bear the burdens of taxation. Such school-houses shall be built in accordance with modern plans, which plans shall be furnished free on application to the Bureau of Education, in Washington: Provided, however, That not more than $100 shall be paid from said fund toward the cost of any single school-house, nor more than one-half the cost thereof in any case; and the States and Territories shall annually make full report of all expenditures from the school-house fund to the Secretary of the Interior as in case of other moneys received under the provisions of this act.

Mr. President, from the fate the other amendment met it is very likely that this will meet the same; but inasmuch as I have not agreed to any proposition that I am compelled to vote for, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to this amendment which I offer, and which strikes me as being reasonable if this bill is to pass.

We have now statistics and estimates showing that it will require about 57,465 school-houses for the necessary uses of the children if this bill shall go into operation and the children of this country are to be educated. I propose an appropriation of $2,000,000 to assist in building school-houses in sparsely settled portions of the country; and that sum, according to the estimates, will build at least 20,000 school-houses. Plans have been made for a very nice school-house, comfortable in all its departments, to cost from $200 to $250 apiece. In some places a school-house that would be suitable for the neighborhood may be built for $75 or $50, while in other places it might cost $100, and in others it might cost $200 or $250, according to these plans.

In my judgment there is not very much necessity of appropriating money to educate children unless the children can have some place in which to be educated. The statement made the other day that they go into dwelling-houses and so on is not correct. That is not the way the children will be educated so far as these common schools are concerned. According to the distribution provided for in the bill if it passes the money will be used by the States, and can be used where school-houses are already prepared to receive pupils without ever erecting another school-house in addition to those already erected. It does seem to me that if you want to provide for the education of illiterate people, and especially for the education of the colored people, of the South you must provide some accommodations to go along with it.

The first bill I introduced in Congress on the subject contained a provision that none of the money should be used for the purpose of erecting school-houses, but I became satisfied afterward on examination and reflection that I was in error in that particular, that a portion of the money ought to be appropriated for the purpose of assisting in erecting school-houses in neighborhoods where the people were poor. The answer to that, I know, is that the States will provide for this. But you must remember that each town—at least it is so in the North and I presume it will be so in the most of the Southern States—assesses a tax commonly known and called the school-tax, other than the State tax, for the purpose of supporting schools in that locality, where the people are so poor that they can not themselves pay a tax to build a school-house and can not raise the money, as is frequently the case in many counties where the population is nearly all composed of colored people. They will not be able to tax themselves to build school-houses and tax themselves also in connection with this fund for the education of the children. Hence if you do not provide for building houses or for assisting the people in building the houses or giving them encouragement in that direction, the money appropriated by this bill will be used in communities where houses are already erected, and where the people are more capable of raising taxes for this purpose than they are in the more impoverished portions of the country, where they are not able to do it. If we propose to do anything to aid and assist these people in educating themselves, let us do it in the right way: provide first that they may have an opportunity of being educated, and then if you apply the fund for the purpose of hiring teachers to educate them, this fund, according to the way it would be used under this bill, would be devoted to hiring teachers to educate the children; but who would build the school-houses in which they should be educated?

I suppose it may be said they can do as was done in old times, one take an ax, another a pick, another a spade, and cut down the trees and hew the logs and put up the house themselves; but who is going to do that? They may do it or they may not do it, and a people who are of a rather shiftless character, a people who have been situated as these poor people have been, must have somebody to direct them in the proper way. Many of them are intelligent. Probably you will find in all neighborhoods some who are intelligent enough, but a provision like this will give them encouragement, and allow them to build houses for the purpose of having schools for the education of their children, and if you aid them in doing it you will accomplish much more in my judgment than by scattering the money without affording them any facilities whatever by which they shall have an opportunity to be educated other than merely employing teachers.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to say one word in regard to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois. The vote in favor of the amendment which has just been acted on seems to me to indicate that all who so vote are opposed to appropriating that much money. I voted against it simply on the ground that I thought it would imperil the passage of the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I will ask the Senator if it imperils the passage of the bill that $15,000,000 is appropriated the first year, would it not be better to reduce the appropriation according to his theory, if he wants the bill passed? I am opposed to the reduction of the amount, but the Senators who desire the passage of this bill to secure a sufficient amount to educate these people, as they have indicated in their speeches, and who voted against my amendment, will find before this is over that the result will be a very large reduction, and you are only helping gentlemen who want to take all the money out of this bill by your votes.

Mr. GEORGE. Let me say that I do not think the Senator offered the amendment with a view of defeating the bill at all.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; I offered it in the best of faith, for the reason that I presented the first bill in the Senate Chamber asking that money raised by taxation be distributed for education, first taking the whisky tax, afterward taking $50,000,000 of tax derived from internal revenue and from the sale of public lands. I have been in good faith from the beginning and I am in good faith now, and I offer it because I believe it will require that amount of money and more to accomplish that which you gentlemen propose in this bill; and unless you appropriate money sufficient to do it your law will be a failure.

Mr. GEORGE. I rose merely to say that I did not doubt the good faith of the Senator, and that I would have been in favor as an original proposition of his amendment, but I supposed it would best secure the passage of the bill to vote against it.

Mr. BUTLER. The amendment of the Senator from Illinois is, I believe, to appropriate $2,000,000 for school-houses.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. In case that amendment prevails, I should like to inquire to which government, State or Federal, the school-houses will belong when they are built?

Mr. LOGAN. That is very easily answered. They would belong to the State. This sum is only appropriated to aid in building the school-houses. I offered the amendment giving $100 where the house costs $200, and $50 where it costs $100. This would grant aid from the Government. I do not know what may be in the bill when it ends in reference to the distribution of the fund; but my object is that the money shall be used for helping the people build school-houses in which they themselves are to be educated.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I thought well of the former amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois, and regretted voting against it. I wish to distinctly understand the amendment now before the Senate. Of course the general fund appropriated by the bill can be devoted to any branch of the business of education.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir.

Mr. VOORHEES. I shall be glad to hear the Senator on that point. That was the object I had in rising.

Mr. LOGAN. Do you mean the amendment I offered?

Mr. VOORHEES. I mean that the general appropriation made by the bill, amounting in the aggregate to $105,000,000, can be used in building school-houses.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir, not at all. It is expressly provided in the bill that no portion of the money shall be used for that purpose; and that is the reason I offer the amendment.

Mr. VOORHEES. Then I shall vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I shall vote against this amendment, because it has not been the practice nor is it the law in my judgment of any State in this Union to tax the whole people of the State to build school-houses in the districts. I know it is not so in my State.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator will allow me to make a remark, the Senator misunderstands the amendment

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was just going to say——

Mr. LOGAN. Does the Senator understand that this amendment requires the whole people to be taxed to build a school-house?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, sir; I understand this amendment to appropriate $2,000,000 in addition to the appropriation in the main bill, for the purpose of erecting school-houses in the different districts.

Mr. LOGAN. For the purpose of aiding in the erection of school-houses.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not think that any of the States in their common-school system provide means for erecting common-school houses. They leave that matter entirely to the people of the school districts.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly, and that is my purpose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And some of the districts tax themselves by vote of the people of the districts for money with which to build school-houses.

Mr. LOGAN. The very object of this amendment is to aid those very people in the districts that are poor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In most of the States to be benefited by this bill there are already school-houses erected, or in a large number of them at least; but the portion of the country to be chiefly benefited is a region where timber is abundant. The practice, I know, in my State is when we want to build a school-house in the poorer but well-timbered portions of the State, the people go with their broad-axes and crosscut-saws and cut down the trees and hew the timber into logs, and take them to the nearest saw-mill and have them sawed into planks to make the roof and floors. Where timber is not so abundant they take around a subscription in the afternoon and get money subscribed enough to erect a school-house.

That is the way we do it. I have helped to build three school-houses in the last five years myself. No taxation has ever been put on our school district for school-houses. The people there have voluntarily contributed money enough to build them, and the neighbors have gathered in with their broad-axes and crosscut-saws and erected the buildings themselves. A school-house does not cost much money in a timber country, and the State does not propose to build school-houses anywhere.

Mr. BLAIR. Nor is it so provided in this amendment. The Senator misapprehends, I think, the force of the amendment somewhat.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, surely not. The amendment of the Senator from Illinois provides that $2,000,000 shall be used for the purpose of building school-houses.

Mr. BLAIR. I would not think of interrupting the Senator if I did not feel that he was misapprehending the amendment a little. If he will listen to me a moment, I think I can remove his objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I shall be thankful for a correction. I shall listen with pleasure.

Mr. BLAIR. It is shown by one of the tables that has been alluded to, printed in the RECORD of the 19th of March, that in order to furnish school-house accommodations to the unenrolled scholars in the Southern States alone (and a great many are wanted in the Northern States as well) 36,000 new school-houses are needed.

Mr. LOGAN. Fifty-seven thousand.

Mr. BLAIR. Thirty-six thousand in those States; 57,000 in the whole country.

Mr. LOGAN. That is what I say; 57,000 for the number of children who are not provided for.

Mr. BLAIR. In the whole country.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes.

Mr. BLAIR. But in what we call the Southern States 36,000 are necessary. It is fair to presume that in the course of the next few years this want will be very largely supplied. A great number of school-houses are to be erected, and it is of very great consequence that these school-houses should be erected in accordance with proper sanitary principles and regulations, and with a proper regard to the convenience and comfort of the scholar and the teacher. In other words, they should be erected after some common model, and that the latest and the best. It was testified before the committee by one of the superintendents of public instruction that in one of the States of the Union many of the school-houses cost only about $50 to $100. One hundred and fifty dollars, $200, or $300 builds a very good school-house, and he stated, as does the Senator from Kentucky, that in many localities the people get together, cut the trees, hew them, and build a very excellent building of logs, which answers every purpose, at an actual cash cost of very seldom more than $50, $75, $100, or $150. The neighbors give their work, they give the logs, they draw the timber, and they contribute the remainder, so that with a money outlay of $50 or $100 in almost any of these sparsely populated communities a suitable school-house can be obtained, and if it is only built in accordance with a proper model it serves as a pattern for all the others round about.

The sanitary conditions essential to a school-house are the same sanitary conditions that are essential to a dwelling-house; and one of the great evils in this country, one of the great sources of contribution to ill-health and sickness and death, is the fact that the dwellings of the country are not properly constructed. If you put in a community a school-house built in accordance with sanitary rules and regulations it serves not only as a model for the construction of all other school-houses throughout that portion of the country, but of dwellings as well. So the effect of the adoption of this amendment would be to plant all through the South and largely through the North, too, a new and model school-house, in accordance with which institutions of that kind can be constructed anywhere, giving practical instruction to the eye of the people everywhere, and in addition to that a great benefit will be conferred in the construction of the dwellings of this country.

Mr. VEST. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BLAIR. Yes, sir?

Mr. VEST. I should like to ask him who furnishes the plan?

Mr. BLAIR. The amendment shows that. I will state the substance of it. This amendment proposes to distribute $2,000,000 only; not $2,000,000 per year, but $2,000,000 in all, in sums not exceeding $100 in any case, and in no instance to contribute more than one-half the amount necessary in order to secure the construction of the school-house. So if $50 in cash, with the contributions of the neighbors, will build a house, that is all that will be taken from the fund. But assuming that $100 is taken for each school-house, then this sum will assist in the construction and stimulate the construction of 20,000 school-houses in this country.

The appropriation is by the terms of the amendment confined to the sparsely populated and the poorer districts of the country; and the plans—that is the point to which the Senator from Missouri called my attention—are by the terms of the amendment to be furnished free by the Bureau of Education of the United States. They have of course the latest models, the latest ideas, and can furnish them without any substantial expense. They can be printed upon common paper and circulated, and will be sufficient to guide in the work of construction.

I hope, Mr. President, that this amendment will be adopted. So far as its adding anything to the appropriation in the bill is concerned, I ought to state that it is already apparent that an amendment is to be offered and very strongly pressed, and very likely it may become incorporated with the bill, which will reduce the term of the operation of this bill to eight years and the aggregate amount to be expended during those eight years to $77,000,000. If it continued for the ten years it would be within $5,000,000 of the amount appropriated in the bill as it now stands; but if the reduction is made to $77,000,000 by the proposed amendment of the first section, it would seem a very trifling burden to add this amendment of the Senator from Illinois to the bill for the very significant and important purpose which has been indicated. I hope that the amendment will prevail.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I voted against the former amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois, but it was because the committee had agreed to support the bill as it stood. I appreciated the purpose and the interest the Senator from Illinois had already taken in the subject. I shall support this amendment. I do not see that it conflicts in any point of view with the bill. I understand it simply proposes to aid in those districts where the people are unable to build their own school-houses.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois a question in reference to his amendment. It says:

> That there shall also be appropriated and set apart the sum of $2,000,000, which shall be allotted to the several States and Territories on the same basis as the money appropriated in the first section, which shall be known as the common-school-house fund, to be paid out annually to each State and Territory.

Do I understand the Senator to mean by that $2,000,000 annually are to be paid out?

Mr. LOGAN. No sir.

Mr. BUTLER. The $2,000,000 is to be paid out annually for how many years?

Mr. LOGAN. It does not provide for any number of years. If the amendment be adopted it means, or at least I tried to have it mean, that as long as the school-houses were built they should be paid for. The twenty thousand may not all be built this year. Some may be built and a portion of the money paid out for those so built, and for the number built next year that portion will be paid out, and so on. That is the meaning of it. If it is not intelligible in the manner in which it is drafted, we can change it so as to make it so. That is the object.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to ask the Senator another question. His amendment says:

> Such school-houses shall be built in accordance with modern plans, which plans shall be furnished free on application to the Bureau of Education.

Mr. LOGAN. I think it is expressed so as to be understood, but there is no trouble in changing the words so as to make the design clear.

Mr. BUTLER. To whom shall the plans be furnished and who are to superintend the building?

Mr. LOGAN. The plans are already in the office, as I understand; at least plans have been drafted and will be received from the office here in Washington.

Mr. BUTLER. Precisely, but——

Mr. LOGAN. The school-houses are to be built as they are now, by the officers of the school districts. Whoever has charge of that matter will have charge of building the school-houses. This does not change the law of the State; it does not attempt to do it or to interfere with it. The object is that this money, if appropriated, shall be distributed in the same manner. How? Paid over to the States, as this bill provides for the distribution of the school fund for common schools, and in the same manner this will be distributed for the building of school-houses.

That is all that the language used in reference to the distribution being according to the first section means, that it shall be distributed in the same manner to the States and Territories, and then it goes into the uses when distributed as required in the different sections where school-houses are to be built, the plans to be furnished without cost. It means that the plans shall be furnished by the national Bureau of Education, and they shall be furnished without cost to the persons building the school-houses, namely, the officers in the school district, whoever they may be, who shall have charge of building school-houses. That is a matter for the State to provide for, and not for us to provide for in this bill.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois who is to determine the question as to the sparseness or density of the population where these school-houses are to be built. It is not a general provision, as I understand the amendment, to build school-houses wherever they may be needed; but, as explained by the Senator from New Hampshire, it is to aid in the construction of school-houses in sparsely settled neighborhoods. Who will determine the question as to whether the neighborhood applying is a sparsely or a densely populated neighborhood?

Mr. LOGAN. I think that is a question which can be very easily answered.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope so.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator in a manner seems to think there is something terrible in that. I presume where the Senator resides, if he was inquired of to-day where the most thickly settled portion of his county was he could inform the Senate. I presume if he was inquired of as to where the most sparsely settled portion of that county was he could give that information. If you have a school superintendent in your county who has not capacity enough to determine the sparsely and the densely populated portions of your county you had better choose another one. It would be determined just as any other fact is determined, by the proper officers of your States, not by the General Government. I can not tell where the sparsely settled portions of your States are or the densely populated portions are outside of the cities. I can not determine it by an amendment nor can the Senate, but the officer who has charge of the common schools of the county or district, or however it may be laid off in your States, from his own information and by making inquiries, must ascertain it as he ascertains anything else. Turn to the census, and there you will find the information now without going any further.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Illinois did not seem to quite comprehend the question that I propounded.

Mr. LOGAN. I thought I did.

Mr. HARRIS. If I understand the amendment of the Senator, it proposes to appropriate a gross sum of money which according to his estimate will aid in the construction of some 20,000 school-houses, when according to statistics there are 57,000 school-houses necessary. It will probably appear in the practical application of this fund that you will find perhaps every locality needing a school-house applying for it. The party entitled to it is the party residing in a sparsely settled neighborhood. It seems to me that some tribunal, State or Federal, will have to determine the question as to which of the 57,000 applications that are made for aid are to be entitled, as only 20,000 out of the 57,000 can be aided.

Mr. LOGAN. It seems to me to be as simple a proposition as any in the world. Suppose there were 100,000 school-houses required. The people in the localities where school-houses are not required would not apply for aid from this fund; there are many places in the country where they do not need it. Wherever school-houses are already erected, the application would of course be refused, because they have the accommodations.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me? The difficulty that occurs to me is the one which I suppose occurs to the Senator from Tennessee, and the Senator from Illinois does not meet it as it exists in my mind. I do not understand that it is based on any difficulty in finding out whether a territory is sparsely or densely settled by the person whose duty it is, but the question is, who is to determine which of these communities shall have it, the State authorities or the Commissioner of Education or the Secretary of the Interior or some other; who is to determine?

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I will answer the Senator from Massachusetts. If he will tell me who is to determine as to the distribution of the fund that is appropriated for school purposes, then I will tell him who is to determine about this. This is to be distributed to the States and Territories just as the school fund is distributed to them. Who then determines where that is to go?

Mr. HOAR. The State, of course.

Mr. LOGAN. Well, then, the State determines this. You give it to the State and let the State decide for its people, and that is all there is in it.

Mr. HOAR. That I understand.

Mr. LOGAN. That is all there is in this proposition. You distribute the school fund, $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 or whatever it may be, to the State or Territory. It passes from the hands of the General Government. Then the States distribute it according to their law; that is, for the benefit of the illiterate class it is to be distributed, I suppose according to population. That is the provision of the bill in reference to the illiterate class. So then this money goes into the hands of the State or Territory, and if the General Government does not say in this proposition how it shall be distributed, it goes in accordance with the provisions of the bill, then, to the officers of the State, for them to determine the question as to the densely settled or sparsely settled portions of the country. It is certainly true that a school superintendent would not distribute a portion of this money to a neighborhood already supplied with a school-house; but he would distribute it where they have not a school-house, where the people are not able to build school-houses, where the population is sparse, so far separated that they have not organized schools. It would naturally be determined according to the judgment of this person. That is the way I would determine it, and I presume the way the Senate would determine it. There is no other way to determine it according to this bill. That is the object of this amendment.

Mr. CALL. I understand the proposition of the honorable Senator from Illinois to be very plain as he states it. This amendment is to become, if adopted, a section of the pending bill, which provides for the distribution of this money to the State authorities to be expended in accordance with the existing school systems for the purposes declared in the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GORMAN (when his name was called). On this amendment I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. JONAS (when Mr. GIBSON's name was called). My colleague [Mr. GIBSON] is paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER].

Mr. BUTLER (when Mr. HAMPTON'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. HAMPTON] is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY].

Mr. MCMILLAN (when his name was called). I was paired yesterday with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] on questions arising on this bill, but I find that my pair continues to-day, although it was not mentioned, as the Senate was not expected to be in session to-day. The pair, however, has been transferred to the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER]. I therefore am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay." The Senator from Delaware, if present, would vote "nay" on this amendment as I understand. I am not aware how the Senator from New York would vote.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. LAMAR] with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON].

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 20, nays 28; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LOGAN. I have another amendment to offer. I move to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. —. No State or Territory that does not distribute the moneys raised for common-school purposes equally for the education of all the children, without distinction of race or color, shall be entitled to any of the benefits of this act.

I desire just a moment to explain the amendment. I have no faith in its being adopted, because I see that nothing which is for the benefit of this bill is going to be adopted. The law in Kentucky provides that the taxes assessed on the property of the white people shall be used only for the education of white children, and the only educational fund there for the colored people is that which is raised from taxation on their own property. In Delaware the law is pretty much of the same character. This provision is to indicate to the States that they will not get any of this money until they provide for the equal distribution of the school fund among colored as well as white children. If a State can not afford to do that, the Government of the United States ought not to appropriate one dollar for the education of its children. That is all there is in it; and the object I have is to require the States to give this money equally to the colored as well as to the white children, and not only this money, but the school money generally, before they get any benefit from this appropriation.

Mr. HARRISON. I am in favor of the principle contained in the amendment which the Senator from Illinois has offered, and I only rise to call his attention to the fact that in an amendment I have proposed, which is printed together with the bill, this same provision is contained, and is contained in connection with a clause requiring a preliminary report by the States of what they have done in the preceding year, and then proceeds as follows:

No money shall be paid out under this act to any State or Territory that has not provided by law a system of free common schools for all of its children of school age, without distinction of color either in the raising or distributing of school revenue or in the school facilities afforded.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand that.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know where the Senator proposes to put his amendment in the bill. I only rose to suggest, as it is contained in connection with a proposition that I think will meet his concurrence, that we shall have the preliminary report as to these facts from the State, whether it would not suit him as well to have it voted upon in connection with the other matter which I have proposed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let me respond for one moment to my friend the Senator from Illinois. What he stated was the law in Kentucky, but that law was repealed two years ago.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg the Senator's pardon. It has not been repealed, and your Legislature has never voted on the repeal. Although the Senator represents that State and ought to know better than I do about this, yet I feel authorized to state that your supreme court have decided the law to be unconstitutional, but your Legislature has not repealed it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the superintendent of public instruction has gone on and distributed the money to all, and the colored children get their portion of it as well as the whites. I will not say positively, because I have not the acts before me, but my recollection is that the statute was repealed two years ago.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; I beg the Senator's pardon. The matter is before your Legislature now. It has not been repealed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. My Republican colleague in the other House [Mr. WHITE] confirms what I say. He was at my back this moment. I stated it substantially to the Senate several days ago. If I had thought there would be any question about it I would have provided myself with the acts. But I know one thing, the supreme court of our State has decided the old law to be unconstitutional, and the black children are entitled to the benefit of the fund as well as the white; and they have gone on and organized schools, getting their proportion with the whites.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand what your supreme court have decided, for I have read the decision. It is immaterial as to whether the law has been repealed or not. My understanding is that it has not been repealed. If the law has been repealed and the distribution in your State is equal to the children of both races, then this proviso does not affect your State, and certainly can not be objectionable to you.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Except that it is already in the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. It is not in the bill. It is in an amendment that the Senator from Indiana proposes to offer. I am offering this amendment to the bill. I have no objection to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, but I presented this amendment some days ago and had it printed, and said I would offer it to the bill. I do not say that there is any particular difference whether my amendment or his is adopted; but inasmuch as this was offered first and I offered it and it is before Senate, I shall ask that it be voted upon. The action on it need not affect the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. HARRISON. I have no disposition in the world to rob the Senator from Illinois of any credit. I only called his attention to the fact that by the bill as it stands there is no provision made for any report from the States before the first year's money is distributed. My amendment provides for that, and provides that this very fact, this very condition which he expresses in his amendment, shall appear by the report of the authorities of the State, not simply to be judged of by the Secretary of the Interior; and it was merely a matter of convenience, because if the amendment he proposes is adopted and goes into a certain place in the bill, then it will not come in properly in connection with the preliminary report. So far as any credit one way or the other is concerned, I should be glad to turn over this whole amendment and let the Senator adopt it as part of his own and move it, so that it may be voted on in the proper place.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator is very sensitive. I said nothing about credit to anybody.

Mr. HARRISON. I am not sensitive at all.

Mr. LOGAN. I certainly said nothing about any credit to anybody. I ask no credit for it. I offered it because I thought it was right. I certainly had something to do with introducing bills on this subject, and I do not claim any more right than anybody else; but I surely have a right to offer an amendment if I desire to do so.

Mr. HARRISON. Unquestionably the Senator has the right. I simply rose to make a suggestion whether, in order to keep the bill in some such shape that we would not be getting in things and then having to modify them if another amendment was adopted, we should act on the two propositions together—that was my suggestion—and that we should require this preliminary report, and directly in connection with it put in the proposition the Senator has mentioned. That was all. It was simply in order that the text of the bill, if these amendments receive the concurrence of the Senate, shall be in proper shape.

Mr. LOGAN. I suppose the committee that met together and organized this bill, if they have done it, voted this proposition out of the bill, and I do not see any way for me to do except to have it voted on I offered it as an amendment, and I only ask a vote.

Mr. VOORHEES. I simply wish to say that the purpose of the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois is eminently right, eminently correct. At the same time I do not attach very great importance to its adoption, for the reason that whether the State of Kentucky has already repealed the act referred to or not she certainly will do it as soon as this bill becomes a law. And further than that, in justice to that old Commonwealth, whose blood fills my veins as well as those of the Senators from Kentucky, I wish to remark that that law, although still lingering on the statute-book, is not executed by her authorities, and there are no distinctions or discriminations against the colored race in the matter of education in Kentucky any more than in any other State of the Union. Still if the Senator from Illinois insists on his amendment and thinks it important, it is right in principle, and I shall vote for it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I now move as one amendment the two propositions which the Senate consented might be put as one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves to amend the bill. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 3, it is proposed to strike out "ten," before "years," and insert "eight;" so as to read:

That for eight years next after the passage of this act there shall be annually appropriated from the money in the Treasury the following sums, to wit.

And in line 5, after the words "to wit," to strike out:

The first year the sum of $15,000,000, the second year the sum of $14,000,000, the third year the sum of $13,000,000, and thereafter a sum diminished $1,000,000 yearly from the sum last appropriated, until ten annual appropriations shall have been made, when all appropriations under this act shall cease.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

The first year the sum of $7,000,000, the second year the sum of $10,000,000, the third year the sum of $15,000,000, the fourth year the sum of $13,000,000, the fifth year the sum of $11,000,000, the sixth year the sum of $9,000,000, the seventh year the sum of $7,000,000, the eighth year the sum of $5,000,000.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I wish to say a word in regard to this amendment, and but a word.

It is true that this amendment diminishes by about $30,000,000 the aggregate amount appropriated by the original bill, but the original bill is liable to two or three considerations. In the first place, it begins with a very large sum, the sum of $15,000,000, and proposes to distribute to some States a sum equal to twice what they now appropriate. A great many very experienced persons feel that it will be impossible, suddenly and at once and without any previous notice, to provide for the wise, economic, and efficient expenditure of so large a sum of money. As has been already stated, 57,000 more school-houses are needed to make an efficient common-school system throughout the country. The amendment of the Senator from Illinois proposed, as I thought very wisely, to provide in part for that building, and I hope that amendment will be yet adopted, before the bill gets through, by the Senate, which defeated it by only three or four votes.

In the next place, the bill goes over the period of the next census, the census of 1890, so that you have got for the two smallest sums, which are to be distributed under the orginal bill, to make for two years only a total change in the proportion of the distribution to a district or a State. You get a very different proportion these last two years from what they had the preceding two years, as well as a diminishing sum.

If the $77,000,000 which I propose turn out to be insufficient, and the experiment—which is an experiment, viewed with grave concern by its friends as well as its opponents—succeed, undoubtedly Congress at the close of these eight years will do what shall be found necessary and expedient and wise. The judgment of the whole American people will be unmistakably expressed upon the general scheme long before the expiration of that time, and any defect in the present scheme can be supplied in the future. But it seems to me, having been as early and as earnest a friend of this general scheme as anybody, that it is wiser to begin as this amendment does with a smaller sum the first year, increase it the second, increase it again the third, and then let the process of diminution begin and have it terminate at the end of eight years, when the new census will have ascertained the condition of the people in respect to illiteracy and the population of the different States and counties.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, I desire to say with reference to this amendment that it has become apparent by consultation with individual Senators upon both sides of the Chamber that with many the considerations stated by the Senator from Massachusetts have great weight, and I feel constrained personally to yield my judgment to theirs. When one examines the amendment closely, however, the difference is not one which seriously embarrasses or diminishes the efficiency of the bill. It reduces the term of its operation two years, but the bill itself is a bill making appropriation for but one year and a declaration of policy to be pursued for a certain length of time which can be safely acted upon by the States interested provided that the conditions which the bill contains are complied with. If the bill should continue operative under the amendment for eight years the total expenditure would be $77,000,000. If it were $80,000,000 the average would then be $10,000,000 yearly, and for the ten years it would make the amount carried by the bill $100,000,000, which is only $5,000,000 less than it now provides for.

I yield my judgment on this matter with great reluctance, I must confess, but I think that the bill will be stronger and that the general judgment of the Senate ought to be preferred to my own.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts how much is the reduction he proposes?

Mr. HOAR. The total amount proposed by the amendment is $77,000,000, and the amount in the original bill is $105,000,000, $28,000,000 difference.

Mr. MORGAN. That is a very small matter, $28,000,000, in a bill of this description, but I would admonish the Senator from Massachusetts that it is really the interest of the friends of the bill to have the amount large, because he will lose votes for it if he does not keep the sum up to $105,000,000. It is not the principle of the bill so much as the amount of money involved in it that gives it currency and popularity and strength, and as he is a friend of the bill, he ought to manifest his friendship by keeping up the amount.

Mr. HOAR. I have said in the hearing of the Senator that I was a friend of this bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I hope the Senator will keep it up to the maximum rate of $105,000,000, and I venture to suggest that he will weaken the bill very much, if he does not actually destroy it, because it will not do to undertake to get the Senators on this side of the Chamber committed to the principle of this bill without furnishing a very large amount of money as an inducement for their votes. [Laughter.] And if there is any disclosure of a policy of a reduction of this amount of money now or hereafter some of the Senators on this side will feel very badly if they should find that their friends on the other side were not going to give the amount of money which it has been understood was to be the fruit of this bill in consideration of their votes.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not know what motives the Senator from Alabama may choose to impute to his political associates on the other side of the Chamber. I am myself sometimes thought to speak with considerable emphasis, and I believe some gentlemen think with some bitterness. I do not know the gentleman on that side of the Chamber to whom I would impute the motive, in my secret heart, which the Senator from Alabama, if I understand him, has openly avowed. I profess to be the friend of this bill and of this measure, and in moving this amendment I move it because I think it makes the bill better. I think it wiser, this being, as we all agree, a great experiment, experimental as to its producing the general effect that we desire; experimental also in the matter whether we shall find State agencies and instrumentalities now prepared and ready to carry out its purposes. I vote for this bill because these men at the South, colored and white, are my countrymen, entitled within the functions of the National Government to my interest, care, and friendship as much as the citizens of Worcester County, Massachusetts, where I dwell. If it be a matter of national concern to provide by national authority that the American people shall be fit in intelligence for a republican government; if we have the right (as we have the right to defend this Constitution in war) to defend it against the greater danger of ignorance in cases where the local instrumentalities, through their own misfortune or through their own fault are unable to do it, then this bill is an exertion by national authority of a proper national constitutional function.

I do not put my support of this measure on any argument growing out of the right to appropriate money for the general welfare. I do not go into any subtle refinements as to any distinction between the right to give land and the right to give money. I undertake to say that the Legislature of this nation has a right to save the life of this nation against whatever danger; and at a time—I do not impute it to any Senator on this floor—when honest men, intelligent men, influential men declare in my hearing that this black ignorance in this country is so great a menace to their property, their government, their civilization itself that all must perish alike if the mandate of our Constitution be obeyed and these men have their votes counted man for man honestly and fairly in State and national elections, and that that danger is so great and so overwhelming that they deem themselves entitled to resort for self-preservation to any agency of force or finesse that will keep these men from the ballot—there are certainly intelligent men and influential newspapers in numbers that say that in this country—I think it the duty of the National Legislature to say at least we will exert within the bounds of reason our constitutional power and this great national force to remove this menace. I think it is a better thing to try the experiment whether by educating a black man he can be made fit for American citizenship than without trying that experiment to cheat him out of his vote.

Mr. MORGAN. I am sorry that did not occur to the Senator before he conferred the citizenship on him. He should have tried the experiment of educating him then.

Mr. HOAR. Well, Mr. President, I will not be drawn into a crimination or recrimination in regard to past history, recent or remote. I will not talk with a man, in the way of debate I mean, as to whether I did right or wrong or whether he did right or wrong from 1860 to 1865; as to whether I did right or wrong or he did right or wrong from 1865 to 1875, or as to any other period of history about which the two sides of this Chamber are divided. I have this one thing to say, that the people of the North view this not as a party measure, as the votes in this Chamber have already shown. When my honorable friend from Indiana and myself can come together, representing Massachusetts Republicanism and Radicalism and Indiana Democracy, and say to our friends in these Southern States, "We will tax our constituencies to the extent that they can bear, and give over to your States the money to educate and elevate these people who are cast upon you," I do not propose to accompany that act by a discussion of the question whether I or you have been right in our conduct or our opinions in the past.

Why, Mr. President, are we not American citizens? Can we not talk about educating our children and raising the money to do that without having flung in our faces everything by way of taunt and sting that the memory and imagination of the honorable Senator from Alabama can suggest to him?

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me just one moment.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. I merely wish to say to him that this morning when I had the honor of reading a portion of the constitution of Massachusetts the Senator was not in his place, and I desire now to refer to what I then said for his information. This is what I said:

> They even go so far as to inculcate the duty upon the Legislature of providing by law so that sincerity and good humor and social affections and generous sentiments shall be encouraged among the people.

I begged the Senator not to get ill-humored, for I read to him from his own constitution.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Alabama has taken six mortal hours addressing such Senators as had the additional virtue not mentioned in that constitution of patience to sit in their seats and hear him, to crowd together everything by the way of sting and insult that he could think of with which to meet on behalf of the great Commonwealth which he in part represents this offer from Massachusetts.

Mr. MORGAN. But my people have never put me under the injunction of being in a good humor while I was being abused by other people.

Mr. HOAR. I undertake to say—I do not yield any further—that I do not mean to be drawn into a debate or discussion in regard to the political history of this country, remote or recent. We come here with from $77,000,000 to $105,000,000 in our hands and we say to you, "If this money will help you to educate the illiterates in your States, whom some of you say you can not educate from your own resources, take it and God bless you," and the Senator from Alabama replies with the fact that the merchants of Boston and of Newport two hundred years ago practiced the slave trade and that somebody else did something immediately after the war, and so on, and so on, and so on.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator allow me to say that in all of that six hours' speech I did not refer to the slave trade? The Senator has imagined what he thinks I ought to have said about him and his people.

Mr. HOAR. Somebody did.

Mr. MORGAN. I suppose I had better express my regret that I did not tell the truth on him while I was up and which I did not do from forbearance.

Mr. HOAR. Somebody did. Whether it was the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] or the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] I shall not undertake to be sure.

Now, Mr. President, to come back to this amendment. It seems to me, giving the best and most careful examination to the matter that I can, that the sum of $15,000,000 can not in all probability be usefully, economically, and efficiently expended the first year, and that instead of starting with the larger sum we had better start with a smaller sum, and let our $15,000,000 be expended the third year, when the State superintendents and the State authorities will have got used to it. I think it is better to stop our expenditure with the census of 1890, at the end of eight years. We shall get the new census probably about 1892 or 1893. We did not get the last one until 1883. That is the whole of the amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to ask the Senator from New Hampshire one question. Does he regard the adoption of this amendment as essential to the success of the bill?

Mr. BLAIR. I will state precisely how I think the situation is. About half the Democrats are against the bill anyway, and about half the Republicans are against the bill anyway unless it is somewhat amended. I am satisfied if this amendment is adopted, and some other amendments that I think do not weaken or hurt the bill at all, we can get a nearly unanimous vote on this side and just as many on the other, and we shall get the benefit of the measure.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator from Mississippi had addressed the question to the Senator from New Hampshire as to what the caucus action was on the bill perhaps he might have succeeded in getting a knowledge as to the shape in which it is to be put.

Mr. BLAIR. I will tell the Senator about the caucus. The caucus was a conference. We had much difference of opinion. I stood for this bill absolutely and unqualifiedly, and nobody knew until I came into the Chamber to-day and began voting that I was not going to vote absolutely for the bill. But I am satisfied in my own mind that the bill is stronger and we can pass it with some modifications. I dare not run the risk of losing this great measure upon what I consider secondary considerations, and I have yielded my judgment somewhat.

Mr. MORGAN. I am very glad that the Senator from New Hampshire has informed us that there was a caucus and this measure took shape in that caucus. Whether he is bound by a caucus of his own party or not makes no difference to me; but certain of our friends on this side will have the satisfaction of knowing when the bill is passed that it is one which has been shaped in a Republican caucus. I supposed that this measure was really one that would carry out the pretensions of its friends, that it was not a party measure in any sense at all, while here we find that a Republican caucus has met upon it and determined upon its shape, and I hope upon its destiny also.

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course I suppose that nothing which can be said, especially by one entertaining the views I do, can affect the vote on the measure; but I simply want to congratulate the Senator from Massachusetts upon having boldly avowed what the real basis of this measure is and what the advocates of it mean that it shall effect. It is not enough that it should be a caucus measure. The Senator from New Hampshire says that if the caucus amendments are adopted it insures a unanimous vote upon that side of the Chamber.

Mr. BLAIR. I said no such thing, or if I did say it I withdraw it. I did not mean it.

Mr. VEST. You said words to that effect.

Mr. BLAIR. I said I thought it would secure very nearly a unanimous support on this side of the Chamber. It will not have a unanimous support. There are several Senators on this side who are absolutely opposed, as I understand them, to the bill in any form; as radically opposed to it, I think, as the Senator from Missouri. I said I was satisfied the bill would be very much stronger. I made a close calculation as to how the Democratic side of the Chamber would vote, and I know better now how they will vote than I know how my friends on this side of the Chamber will vote. I can tell you very nearly.

I said what I did in regard to our conference simply because I would not so treat this measure as to intimate that there is any secret to be concealed in it. There is no understanding that Republicans are or are not to vote for the measure. No Republican caucus binds a Republican in that sense that I have ever attended. I am as much at liberty as a party man to vote against this amendment as I ever was.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator from Missouri will allow me, I should like to say a word.

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to say in regard to the caucus that if there was any caucus on this bill I did not receive any notice of it. If I had attended, probably I should not have offered my amendment and have had an almost unanimous vote of the Republicans against it. I was not in any caucus where this bill was discussed, and I think if there had been a caucus I at least ought to have been notified. If the amendment was prepared in the caucus I might object to it, because I certainly received no notice of it, and I might regard the vote that was given on my amendment as a symptom of something that I did not understand. I hope hereafter if my friends go into caucus they will let me know about it.

Mr. VEST. I sympathize with the Senator from Illinois in the amendment which he offered in reference to erecting school-houses in the South. If I entertained the opinions which the Senator from Massachusetts avowed here representing the caucus of the Republican party I would have voted for school-houses, and libraries, and to have put a library in the reach of every man, woman, and child in the Southern States. The same power which can pass this bill upon the basis which the Senator from Massachusetts invoked here could give to the South school-houses and libraries and turnpike roads to the school-houses and all the facilities for obtaining education.

The Senator from Massachusetts avows in the very broadest shape the doctrine which Mr. Hamilton announced in 1791 and which Mr. Madison and Mr. Jefferson denounced as leading to centralization and to an utter destruction of the rights of the States. All that is simple history; and it is saying that we have no right to shape our legislation according to the opinions of the men who helped to frame the Constitution.

I congratulate the Senator from Massachusetts and I congratulate myself that I did not misunderstand the object of this bill. The meaning of it is to pledge the Senate to the doctrine so boldly and eloquently avowed by the Senator from Massachusetts, that whenever Congress thinks that the life of the Government is in danger, to use a Republican phrase, then Congress can do what it pleases. The Senator avowed here that whenever the people of a State fail either through neglect or inattention or from any other cause to do what Congress thinks is absolutely necessary for the welfare of the General Government, then Congress has a right to interfere.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, I did not say "absolutely necessary for the welfare of the General Government." I disclaim that. I said "the national life."

Mr. VEST. Exactly, "the life of the nation;" that was the phrase.

Mr. HOAR. That was the phrase.

Mr. VEST. That is the campaign phrase on which the changes have been rung for fifteen years. You can do anything "to preserve the life of the nation." The Senator from Massachusetts sneers at the idea of going to the Constitution for this authority. He says, "I stand here not upon the general-welfare clause, not upon the clause in regard to the Territories and empowering Congress to make rules and regulations in regard to them or the property of the United States; I go to the higher law; I go to any measure that is necessary to preserve the life of the nation." Then if the Senator and his colleagues think that a tariff not for revenue but to the very highest extent necessary to protect any of the industries of this country is necessary, they do not go to the Constitution for the authority, they simply say, "the life of the nation is involved and we will pass this law." Tear up the Constitution; it is obsolete, like the words of Madison and Jefferson, on that side of the Chamber. New lights have come to us. Tear down these arguments; let us become iconoclasts, and put in their place this new doctrine of necessity to save the life of the nation.

I have not been mistaken in regard to the meaning of it, and I congratulate my colleagues upon their learned constitutional arguments and their quotations from the cobwebs of the past that have had so happy and delightful a consummation.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I shall vote for this bill. I should vote for it if the Republican caucus had directed the Senator from Massachusetts to report the amendment which he has offered. I do not conceive that the difference between political parties rests upon the proposition whether one caucus or another may recommend some specific measure not connected with party distinctions. Neither do I agree with the honorable Senators from Missouri, nor from Texas, nor the Senator from Delaware, nor the Senator from Alabama, that they speak correctly when they interpret Mr. Madison and Mr. Jefferson and the fathers of the country as affirming that to give, either in money or in lands, aid to a prostrate and helpless State to reorganize its industries or its educational system is contrary to the spirit of the Constitution or without the sanction of their example. We have heard a great deal of that; but I hold in my hand—as this question has been raised here so often—a message of Mr. Jefferson's which I wish to read. Mr. Jefferson in one of his messages, on the 2d of December, 1806, says to Congress:

> Education is here placed among the articles of public care—

This is a message addressed to Congress, and it is in regard to education, national education, as to which we have been so often told here that we are violating the canons of the Democratic party and the past history of the country in voting money to the States to be applied by them in their own way and under their own laws.

Mr. Jefferson says:

> Education is here placed among the articles of public care, not that it would be proposed to take its ordinary branches out of the hands of private enterprise, which manages so much better all the concerns to which it is equal, but a public institution can alone supply those sciences which, though rarely called for, are yet necessary to complete the circle, all the parts of which contribute to the improvement of the country and some of them to its preservation. The subject is now proposed for the consideration of Congress, because if approved, by the time the State Legislatures shall have deliberated on this extension of the Federal trusts and the laws shall be passed and other arrangements made for their execution, the necessary funds will be on hand and without employment.

It is true that he favored an amendment of the Constitution to give to Congress the power of national education. But how, in the face of this recommendation, can gentlemen claim his authority for the proposition that to give aid to the States for that education in conformity with the State organization and subject to the power of the State, and intrusted to their care alone, is a subversion of the principles of the Constitution and without the sanction of his example, when he makes an express recommendation to Congress that it should be done, and, if necessary, an extension of the Federal trust should be made in order to accomplish it?

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator a question just in that connection?

Mr. CALL. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. Is there anything in that language that justifies Federal aid to State institutions? Is it not confined strictly and exclusively to national purposes?

Mr. CALL. I beg the Senator's pardon; it is to give to Congress the unquestioned power to legislate for national education everywhere that Mr. Jefferson makes that recommendation. That power the exercise of which Senators insist would destroy the Constitution he recommends to be extended and given to Congress by an amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. COKE. Was that amendment adopted?

Mr. CALL. It was never adopted; but both land and money were given. Here is the list which Alabama and every other State had, giving the distribution of the Federal money, which constitutes now the magnificent fund of education in all the States which received it:

|---|---|
| Maine | $955,838 25 |
| New Hampshire | 669,086 79 |
| Massachusetts | 1,338,173 58 |
| Vermont | 669,086 79 |
| Connecticut | 764,670 60 |
| Rhode Island | 282,335 30 |
| New York | 4,014,520 71 |
| New Jersey | 764,670 60 |
| Pennsylvania | 2,867,514 78 |
| Delaware | 286,751 49 |
| Maryland | 955,838 25 |
| Virginia | 2,198,427 99 |
| North Carolina | 1,433,757 39 |
| South Carolina | 1,051,422 09 |
| Georgia | 1,051,422 09 |
| Alabama | 669,086 79 |
| Louisiana | 477,919 14 |
| Mississippi | 382,335 30 |
| Tennessee | 1,433,757 39 |
| Kentucky | 1,433,757 39 |
| Ohio | 2,007,260 34 |
| Missouri | 382,335 30 |
| Indiana | 860,254 44 |
| Illinois | 477,919 14 |
| Michigan | 286,751 49 |
| Arkansas | 286,751 49 |
| Total | 28,101,644 91 |

As was stated by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS], it was the distribution in 1836 of this surplus money, which in all the States which properly used it has created a magnificent fund of education and which has done so much to advance the people of those States.

I ask the Senator from Texas, where does he find in the Constitution the power to annex the territory of Texas to the United States and to appropriate money to pay the debts of Texas? Is it a power committed to the jurisdiction of Congress to pay the debts of a foreign state or of one of our own States? Whether foreign or domestic, no such power is expressly granted, and surely no one will say that by a treaty with a foreign power the express grants of power in the Constitution can be either increased or diminished. Sir, there is far more authority for this donation of money to States than there was for the annexation of the State of Texas, and everybody knows and admits it.

Nor did Mr. Jefferson stop there. I hold in my hand a letter from Mr. Jefferson in which he speaks of the treaty of annexation of Louisiana, and what does he say to my distinguished friend from Missouri [Mr. VEST] who speaks of the cobwebs of the past? He says:

> The Constitution has made no provision for our holding foreign territory, still less for incorporating foreign nations into our Union. The Executive, in seizing the fugitive occurrence which so much advances the good of their country, has done an act beyond the Constitution. The Legislature, in casting behind them metaphysical subtleties and risking themselves like faithful servants, must ratify and pay for it, and throw themselves on their country for doing for them unauthorized what we know they would have done for themselves had they been in a situation to do it.

That is the kind of strict construction of the Constitution by Mr. Jefferson which gentlemen talk so much about, and assert that to depart from it would be to overthrow the Government. And so it was with Mr. Monroe. We all know that they all—Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe—denied the power of the Government to establish internal improvements. We know that the bills that the Senators from Texas and Missouri vote for now every year without objection were affirmed by Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Madison, Mr. Monroe, and by Mr. Calhoun, until the Memphis convention for the improvement of the Mississippi River, to be entirely unconstitutional, as they did the aid to national education; and yet these gentlemen constantly vote for the exercise of a power which these all deny and which was proposed to be given to Congress by an amendment to the Constitution.

I differ from the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. I do not believe that we have any authority, any power, to violate the autonomy and the essential rights and powers of the States. I do believe, as Mr. Monroe most conclusively affirms in his argument, that the power of appropriation does cover every object for the common defense and the general welfare applied as every other power of the Constitution must be consistently with the preservation of the rights and the integrity and power of the State. The bill proposes to do it.

I meet gentlemen upon the other side half way. We appropriate money to aid the States to exert their power. They are free to accept or reject it, and that is all there is in it. We give money to help a State to reorganize its resources and to lift it up, and the Senators who oppose that bill occupy the position of saying that if from any cause the States, Northern or Southern, are exhausted by taxation, prostrate, enfeebled by public calamity, they can not accept, and we can not give them money to aid them and relieve their people temporarily. We can not touch them; but however much they may ask us, we must leave them in their state of feebleness and ignorance and want. I do not so interpret the Constitution; neither did Mr. Jefferson in the case of Louisiana, nor Mr. Calhoun in the case of Texas. I appreciate and respect the motives and opinions of Senators on both sides who oppose this bill, but I can not agree with them.

I accept the practical interpretation of the Constitution by Mr. Jefferson in the spirit and intent with which he made it. He says: "To the States are reserved all legislation and administration in affairs which concern their own citizens only; to the Federal Government whatever concerns foreigners or the citizens of other States; * * * neither having control of the other, but within its own department."

Sir, the Constitution is greater, it is wiser, it is more powerful, it is more beneficent than Senators would make it. Its power of appropriation can be used to aid the States without interfering with their sovereign powers or their internal affairs. The bill does it, and does it generously and carefully, and I think in a manner that will attract the consideration and the approval of the country.

In 1824 that remarkable and very great man Mr. Jefferson, in his ardent zeal for the abolition of slavery, in favor of an appropriation of money or land by the United States for this object, the States consenting, said:

> I am aware that this subject involves some constitutional objections. But a liberal construction of the Constitution justified by the object may go far, and an amendment of the Constitution the whole length necessary.—Jefferson's Works, volume 7, page 335.

Mr. Monroe, on the 4th of May, 1822, in defining the right of appropriation as distinct from the right of sovereignty and jurisdiction over the territory of the States, uses this clear language:

> Although they (the States) may assent to the appropriation of money within their limits for such purposes, they can grant no power of jurisdiction or sovereignty by specific compacts with the United States.

This has been the real and practical interpretation of the Constitution by the long line of Presidents anterior to the war. Within its limits the rights and powers of the States and the National Government can both be used with the utmost beneficence, and no infringement made by either on the other. That this has been the rule of interpretation the acquisition of Louisiana and Florida and Texas all bear witness. Without it, the Senators from Texas, Louisiana, Missouri, and myself, and the States we represent, are out of the Union and have no right to seats here, "for the Constitution and the laws made in pursuance thereof" are the supreme law.

Mr. BROWN obtained the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair, under the new rules, will take this occasion, with the permission of the Senator from Georgia, to lay before the Senate sundry bills from the House of Representatives for reference.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BROWN. I yield for a moment to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. PLATT. I should like to give notice of an amendment which I propose to offer to the bill, and ask that it may be printed, if the bill is not disposed of to-night. I propose to strike out section 12 and insert in lieu thereof:

> That no portion of the money to be expended under the provisions of this act shall be expended or paid in any State in which the number of persons of 10 years of age and upward who can not write is less than 9 per cent. of the whole population thereof.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the proposed amendment will be printed.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BROWN. I yield for a moment to the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY].

Mr. MAXEY. I only want a moment to reply to the statement of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] that in Mr. Jefferson's annual message of December 2, 1806, he was for giving to Congress the power to extend aid to national education everywhere. In that annual message of December 2, 1806, Mr. Jefferson says:

> The duties composing the Mediterranean fund will cease by law at the end of the present season. Considering, however, that they are levied chiefly on luxuries, and that we have an impost on salt, a necessary of life, the free use of which otherwise is so important, I recommend to your consideration the suppression of the duties on salt, and the continuation of the Mediterranean fund, instead thereof, for a short time, after which that also will become unnecessary for any purpose now within contemplation.
> When both of these branches of revenue shall in this way be relinquished there will still ere long be an accumulation of moneys in the Treasury beyond the installments of public debt which we are permitted by contract to pay. They can not, then, without a modification assented to by the public creditors, be applied to the extinguishment of this debt and the complete liberation of our revenues—the most desirable of all objects; nor, if our peace continues, will they be wanted for any other existing purpose.
> The question, therefore, now comes forward, to what other objects shall these surpluses be appropriated, and the whole surplus of impost, after the entire discharge of the public debt, and during those intervals when the purposes of war shall not call for them? Shall we suppress the impost, and give that advantage to foreign over domestic manufactures? On a few articles of more general and necessary use the suppression in due season will doubtless be right, but the great mass of the articles on which impost is paid are foreign luxuries, purchased by those only who are rich enough to afford themselves the use of them. Their patriotism would certainly prefer its continuance and application to the great purposes of the public education, roads, rivers, canals, and such other objects of public improvement as it may be thought proper to add to the constitutional enumeration of Federal powers.
> By these operations new channels of communication will be opened between the States; the lines of separation will disappear, their interests will be identified, and their union cemented by new and indissoluble ties. Education is here placed among the articles of public care, not that it would be proposed to take its ordinary branches out of the hands of private enterprise, which manages so much better all the concerns to which it is equal; but a public institution can alone supply those sciences which though rarely called for are yet necessary to complete the circle, all the parts of which contribute to the improvement of the country and some of them to its preservation. The subject is now proposed for the consideration of Congress, because, if approved by the time the State Legislatures shall have deliberated on this extension of the Federal trusts, and the laws shall be passed and other arrangements made for their execution, the necessary funds will be on hand and without employment. I suppose an amendment to the Constitution, by consent of the States, necessary, because the objects now recommended are not among those enumerated in the Constitution, and to which it permits the public moneys to be applied.
> The present consideration of a national establishment for education, particularly, is rendered proper by this circumstance also, that if Congress, approving the proposition, shall yet think it more eligible to found it on a donation of lands, they have it now in their power to endow it with those which will be among the earliest to produce the necessary income. This foundation would have the advantage of being independent of war, which may suspend other improvements by requiring for its own purposes the resources destined for them.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to reply?

Mr. BROWN. I will yield for a moment to the Senator from Florida, as the Senators are discussing an important point.

Mr. CALL. I did not intend to be understood as saying that Mr. Jefferson recommended the establishment by Congress of a system of common-school education in every State then existing. I did say that he proposed to Congress that education should be the subject of national aid and national power consistently with the rights of the States and the power of the States.

Mr. MAXEY. And that Congress should propose an amendment to the Constitution for that purpose.

Mr. CALL. He did assert that it was a matter of so much importance that the Constitution should be amended. The difference between these gentlemen and myself and others is that they assert that consistently with the power of the States, not interfering with their autonomy, their right to control this fund, the mere donation by Congress would be subversive of the governments and destructive of the powers of the States. That is the difference. There is their inconsistency.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator from Georgia yield to a motion to adjourn?

Mr. LOGAN and Mr. MILLER, of California. Let us have an executive session.

Mr. BLAIR. I hope that neither of those motions will be made, or certainly if made that they will be voted down.

Mr. BUTLER. We are a good deal mixed in our views on the Constitution, and I thought perhaps by next Monday morning we could, to use a common phrase, "straighten out" a little. Therefore I hope the Senator from Georgia will yield to a motion to adjourn.

Mr. BLAIR. I hope the Senate will not adjourn.

Mr. ALLISON. We have done a very good day's work to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BROWN. If it is the desire of the Senate to adjourn, I shall yield and take the floor on Monday.

Mr. BUTLER. At the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from California I will change the motion, and will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a moment before that motion is put.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate is not in order except by unanimous consent.

Mr. BLAIR. I hope the Chair is willing that I should have a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no objection on the part of the Chair.

Mr. BLAIR. I believe that we can finish this bill to-night. ["No!" "No!"] I do not think if we go on with the bill and the amendments that there will be a great deal more of debate, and I am anxious to remain and accomplish that purpose. I understand we have had an intimation from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that it might be well to adjourn or go into executive session. If that should be acted upon, I trust he will not say anything about the naval appropriation bill next Monday or Tuesday.

Mr. ALLISON. I must turn my friend from New Hampshire over to my friend from Maine [Mr. HALE], who has charge of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. I agree with the Senator from New Hampshire, that if the Senate are willing to stay here five, six, or eight hours longer we can finish the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator from Maine will not call up the naval appropriation bill on Monday, if we can have an understanding in the Senate that the education bill shall be finished on Monday. We might have an understanding of that sort.

Mr. HALE. Now, let a proposition be made, perhaps by the Senator from New Hampshire if he is willing to make it, that the final vote shall be taken on Monday at any hour in the afternoon that he may name, 2, 3, 4, or 5 o'clock, and I shall be very glad for one to agree to it. If that can be agreed upon now, I shall not attempt to push the naval appropriation bill on that day. Let the Senator make his proposition.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask unanimous consent that at 4 o'clock on Monday all debate upon the bill and pending amendments shall cease, and that the vote shall be taken.

Mr. VOORHEES. Say half past 4.

Mr. BLAIR. Very well, I will say half past 4 or 5; I am not particular as to the hour.

Mr. VOORHEES. Half past 4 will do.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask unanimous consent that at half past 4, on the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana, debate upon the bill and pending amendments shall cease, and that the vote shall then be taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the debate upon the pending bill shall cease on Monday at half past 4 o'clock, and that the vote shall then be taken.

Mr. HARRISON. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire whether he means that as we reach the various amendments which are to be voted upon there is to be absolutely no explanation of them?

Mr. BLAIR. I assumed that by that time the pending amendments would probably have been discussed and disposed of, many of them. I do not suppose that we shall consume the day until half past 4 o'clock in discussing the now pending amendment.

Mr. HALE. We have been for the last two hours now considering amendments and voting upon them.

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly, and disposing of them.

Mr. VOORHEES. When I suggested half past 4 it occurred to me that that would be ample time to discuss each amendment as it arose, and that we should reach a conclusion of the debate on the amendments and on the bill by that time.

Mr. HARRISON. But, if my colleague will excuse me, we may not reach an amendment at all until half past 4; the entire time may be taken up in general debate on the bill. Then we shall come to the amendments, and while I do not want to make any speech on the bill, I do not want to be hampered by an agreement that would prevent me from making a brief explanation of my reasons for proposing a particular amendment.

Mr. VOORHEES. I would not interfere with any Senator's right to do that.

Mr. HALE. Then let me make a suggestion, that at 2 o'clock on Monday all general debate shall cease upon the bill; that after that hour debate upon the amendments shall be under the five-minute rule; and that the vote shall be taken upon any pending amendments and upon the bill at 4 o'clock.

Mr. BLAIR. At half past 4.

Mr. HALE. Half past 4.

Mr. BLAIR. Would that be satisfactory to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES]?

Mr. HALE. The Senator from New Hampshire will move to take up the bill the first thing after the routine morning business.

Mr. VOORHEES. It is perhaps due to myself to say this much. I had intended to make some remarks upon the bill and give my reasons why I favored its general principles, why I thought it was a wise, beneficent, and patriotic movement in the right direction. I refrained from doing so this afternoon when I might have done it for the purpose of allowing a vote, if possible, to be reached this evening, and I would stay here for that purpose and abstain from making any remarks at all. At the same time, if the character of debate which has been indulged in here this afternoon on my own side of the Chamber is to be continued I would not quite wish discussion on the amendments to be confined to five minutes. There has not been a fair opportunity yet to reply to some things that have fallen from Senators on this side of the Chamber in the last half or three-quarters of an hour, and I would not wish the five-minute rule to apply from and after 2 o'clock on Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire modify his proposition?

Mr. BLAIR. I ask——

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator from New Hampshire will permit me to make a suggestion, I will make this suggestion to the Senator from New Hampshire, that all long speeches shall cease after half past 4 o'clock.

Mr. LOGAN. I would amend that by agreeing to withdraw the Constitution from the debate and then the debate will cease.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not know but that I should be willing to accept that amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. I am under great obligation to both Senators, but I do not think I can make the proposition.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest, in deference to the views of the Senator from New Hampshire, that at 3 o'clock on Monday general debate upon the bill shall cease, and that afterward the amendments shall be considered under what is known as the five-minute rule, and the bill be disposed of before the adjournment on Monday. Then we shall have the bill in hand.

Mr. BUTLER. I suggest 4 o'clock. It would be hardly fair to cut off the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the Senator from Iowa restate his proposition? I did not understand it.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest that at 3 o'clock on Monday what is known as general debate on the bill shall cease.

Mr. VOORHEES. That is right.

Mr. ALLISON. And that afterward amendments shall be considered under the five-minute rule, limiting us all, and that we shall vote finally on the bill on Monday before adjournment.

Mr. VOORHEES. That is so entirely satisfactory that I intended to make that proposition myself.

Mr. HARRISON. Do I understand the Senator when he speaks of the five-minute rule to mean the rule by which Senators shall speak but once and but for five minutes?

Mr. ALLISON. I mean the five-minute rule that we adopt in the consideration of appropriation bills, which is that a Senator may offer an amendment and explain it.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Massachusetts tells me that under that rule a Senator may speak as often as he pleases, though but for five minutes each time.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the proposition of the Senator from Iowa. It is that there shall be unanimous consent that all general debate on the bill shall cease at 3 o'clock on Monday, and that the amendments shall be considered after that hour under the five-minute rule, and the bill be disposed of on Monday.

Mr. VOORHEES. At half past 4.

Mr. ALLISON. Before adjournment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before adjournment.

Mr. VOORHEES. I understood the proposition to be that general debate shall close at 3 o'clock, and that amendments shall be considered from that time until half past 4, when the vote shall be taken.

Mr. ALLISON. No; no time is fixed for the final vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. According to the understanding of the Chair, the proposition is that the vote shall be taken on Monday, without any limitation as to the time when the vote shall be taken.

Mr. VOORHEES. That is all right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I object.

Mr. BLAIR. Let the Chair state the proposition again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the proposition to be that on Monday general debate on the bill shall cease at 3 o'clock; that amendments shall then be considered under the five-minute rule, and the bill be disposed of during the day.

Mr. HARRIS. The five-minute rule referred to is the five-minute rule under Rule VIII, I suppose, which is that each Senator may speak five minutes on the same question, and but once.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not so understand the proposition. The Chair understands the proposition to be the five-minute rule usually adopted on appropriation bills.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes; that is my proposition.

Mr. BLAIR. Then I give notice that I shall move to take up the educational bill immediately after the conclusion of the morning business on Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I did object; but I may not object if I can understand it. If I understand the colloquy that I have just heard between the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR], it is understood that immediately after the educational bill is disposed of some other special order comes up.

Mr. BLAIR. Not at all; I did not understand it so. It depends on the will of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I shall move to take up the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Then I am not disposed to put all the business of the Senate in that shape.

Mr. HOAR. It is in that shape now. The Senator from Maine can at this moment move to take up the appropriation bill if he wanted to, or at any other time. I understand that if this consent is given, after the educational bill is out of the way the Chair would lay before the Senate the next matter in order. Then the Senator from Maine would move to lay it aside, or whatever way he chose, in order to take up the appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. All the business is before the Senate after this bill is disposed of, and is of course entirely in the hands of the Senate. Some motion would be made by somebody or other to proceed to the consideration of a bill. I will say to the Senator from Virginia that what shall be done when the pending bill is disposed of is not involved in the understanding now sought to be made. Whenever this bill is through the measure will come up afterward that the Senate may decide to take up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the proposition of the Senator from Iowa as stated by the Chair?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The only purpose I could have had in making any objection was to try to get this bill to a vote to-night and have it disposed of in some way. There are some other matters pressing for attention, and I thought I would object to a postponement until Monday. Still, out of deference to the wishes of Senators, I will withdraw the objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 41 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 5, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. TALBOTT, until Monday next.

To Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana, until Monday.

To Mr. JOHNSON, until Tuesday, April 8.

To Mr. FOLLETT, for ten days from to-day, on account of important business.

To Mr. TUCKER, for two days.

DAILY HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. BUCKNER. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to submit a privileged motion for reference to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on and after the 14th day of April, 1884, the hour of daily meeting of the House for this session be 11 o'clock a. m.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

COAST-LINE WATER WAY, ATLANTIC AND GULF SEABOARD.

Mr. GOFF. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed to submit a privileged report from the Committee on Naval Affairs. I am directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to report back the following resolution, referred to that committee, and recommend its adoption.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War be, and they are hereby, requested to report to this House, at the earliest day practicable, upon the feasibility and expediency of constructing an interior coast-line of water ways for the defense of the Atlantic and Gulf seaboard, together with an outline of the plan of the same and a general estimate of the cost thereof.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. Is that a privileged report?

The SPEAKER. It is a resolution of inquiry referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and reported back by them.

The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. GOFF moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DIBRELL. I now demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the morning hour for the call of committees.

Mr. DIBRELL. I move to dispense with the morning hour, my object being to then move that the House go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union upon the agricultural appropriation bill. If we go into committee now on that bill we can finish it to-day.

The SPEAKER. The first question will be upon the motion to dispense with the morning hour. That requires a vote of two-thirds.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 73, noes 5.

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the morning hour was dispensed with.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DIBRELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Agriculture to report back the bill (H. R. 5261) making an appropriation for the Agricultural Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, which was recommitted to the committee for reference to the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. DIBRELL. I move that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. BOYLE in the chair).

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of appropriation bills. The Clerk will report the title of the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5261) making an appropriation for the Agricultural Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

Mr. DIBRELL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the first formal reading of the bill for information be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the first formal reading will be omitted.

There was no objection.

Mr. DIBRELL. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Agriculture, in formulating the bill now under consideration, making an appropriation to defray the expenses of the Agricultural Department for the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1885, having carefully considered all of the wants of that Department, have been as liberal in their recommendations to the House as they could well do from an economic standpoint.

The bill appropriates $430,590, which is an increase of $24,950 over the amount appropriated for the present fiscal year, and is $81,550 less than the estimates sent to Congress for the next fiscal year. But the above sum it appears meets the approbation of the Commissioner, who has spoken complimentally of the liberality of the committee.

The sum appropriated for this Department, one of the most important in the country, when compared with the appropriations made to carry on any other Department of the Government, looks very small and insignificant, but the committee believed it was sufficient, and the Commissioner has approved it and expressed himself as fully satisfied with our action.

The great prosperity attending every branch of business, and especially that of agriculture, for the past few years, the great increase in our population and growth of our manufacturing industries, is wonderful. The benefits derived by the agricultural interests of the country at large from the many valuable scientific examinations and reports made through this Department in regard to modes of farming, the habits and mode of destroying insects injurious to the crops of the country, the contagious and infectious diseases of animals, the distribution of improved and valuable seeds, have had a wonderful effect upon the country. And I am constrained to believe that this Department, if properly encouraged by liberal appropriations to enable it to carry out and perfect all such examinations and reports, will in the future develop a greater interest in its success and management than has ever been exhibited before. The wonderful growth and increase in our wealth and population is mainly due to the agricultural interests of the country. To prove this I herewith submit the following statement, which was furnished me by Hon. J. R. Dodge, Chief Statistician of the Agricultural Department, in regard to the production and export of three of the leading articles of our export trade, to wit, cotton, breadstuffs, and animal industries; which is as follows:

In eighteen years before the war cotton production amounted to 53,000,000 bales; in eighteen years since 1865 the production amounts to 75,000,000 bales. The annual average in the first period was nearly 3,000,000 bales; in the latter more than 4,000,000.

The consumption in this country is almost exactly twice as much in the latter period, amounting to nearly one-third of the product, whereas it was before but one-fifth.

The average exports of cotton between 1825 and 1830 were valued at $26,624,436; in 1883 the value was $247,328,721. Yet in the first case the exports were 52.6 per cent. of all agricultural exports, while those of last year were but 36.1 per cent. of agricultural exports.

Great as these exports of cotton are, the aggregate foreign shipments of our agriculture are nearly three times as much. Breadstuffs amounted to $208,049,529, and animal products to $131,015,453.

This comes from variety in industry. There is no less cotton; on the contrary, there is very much more; and many other productions besides of far greater value even than the cotton.

Since 1865 the exports of cotton have brought $3,665,940,553 into the country, and yet those of bread and meat have been greater, amounting to $4,180,734,410 For seven years past breadstuffs alone have brought more money from abroad than cotton. The following statement shows the receipts from those great branches of exports of agricultural products:

| Years. | Cotton. | Breadstuffs. | Animal products. |
|---|---|---|---|
| 1866-'69 | $798,309,431 | $204,010,597 | $140,739,873 |
| 1870-'76 | 1,447,803,864 | 739,792,955 | 578,833,224 |
| 1877-'83 | 1,419,827,258 | 1,459,889,884 | 1,057,467,877 |

| 1883 | 804,223,632 | 184,954,183 | 619,269,449 | 77.00 |

From these figures it will be observed that the export trade in cotton has not increased since the year 1866 up to the year 1883, because the demand abroad would not justify its exportation, the amount exported for the past nineteen years averaging about the same. But the increased manufacturing facilities in this country, with our large increase in population, has consumed the balance, including the large increase in production. While this is the case with cotton, the export trade in breadstuffs has increased more than 100 per cent. from the year 1870 to the year 1876, and nearly 100 per cent. from 1876 to 1883 over the export trade the previous six years. The export trade in animal products has increased in a like ratio, or from 1870 to 1876 it had increased over 100 per cent. over the three years preceding that date; and then, from 1876 to 1883, the export trade in animal products had nearly doubled the last prior six years, when our total exports for the last fiscal year reached the enormous sum of $804,223,632—more than it was ever known to reach before, except in the years 1880 and 1881. Seventy-seven per cent. of this, or $619,269,449, was of agricultural products. This exhibit ought, and I think will, convince the most skeptical financier that the present great and growing prosperity of our country is due in a great measure to the agricultural industries of the country, which have produced this large surplus, that has fed and clothed more than 50,000,000 of our own people and then brought more than $619,000,000 into this country from other countries who have purchased our products to feed and clothe their people, in one year. The lowest average per cent. of our export trade in agricultural exports, from the year 1850 up to the year 1883, is 72 per cent., ranging up as high as 83 per cent. of the whole.

The average value of all animal products, except that of cattle, remains near the same for the past ten years, while that of cattle has more than doubled in that time. And the price of breadstuffs, which is always governed by supply and demand, fluctuates according to the supply and demand in the country. Then, in my judgment, the great agricultural industries of this country are greatly superior in value to that of any other industry; in fact, all other industries are dependent entirely upon it, and could not prosper but for the hard-fisted yeomen of the country who till the soil and produce this vast wealth. Then let us deal fairly and liberally with this branch of the Government, not extravagantly, for extravagance begets corruption and fraud, but let Congress always vote money to anything that promotes the agricultural industries of the country. The farming interests have a very small representation on this floor. Farmers never hang around Congress as lobbyists, nor do they employ any one to lobby for them, but they till the soil and bring forth nearly all of our riches, for which they should have due regard and protection in their honorable pursuits, and Congress should never forget the men who thus produce so much wealth annually. I claim to be an humble farmer, and know whereof I speak.

In thus giving my views in regard to the agricultural industries of the country, I trust it will not be considered out of place in me to express my opinions in regard to other questions pending before Congress, some of which are yet to be acted upon and others that have been disposed of. I know it is common for men to differ, and upon great political questions it is right and proper that men should differ, and that they should freely commune together and exchange their views upon all questions that they may have to pass upon, and when the time for action comes, let us look alone to the welfare of our common country. I believe that every member of this honorable body desires to legislate for the good of the whole country; but it is natural that men should differ, and differ widely, as to what is best for the country at large.

I know that local interests influence the action of many of us. I think it is a duty that every Representative owes to his constituents who elected him to this honorable and responsible office to represent the will and wish of those constituents so far as they may make it known to him, and to endeavor to the best of his ability to carry out their wishes upon all bills of a public nature. A member who will not do this should be retired by his constituents and one selected who would have due regard for those he represents. Believing this, I think in my course in this Congress I know the wishes of my constituents, which are in accord with my own views. Having opinions of my own thus backed by an honorable and noble constituency, and believing them to be for the best interests not only of those whom I have the honor to represent but for the whole country, I dare express my opinions and to stand by them. Under no circumstances could I be induced to cast a vote that I believed would be detrimental to the best interests of those whom I am endeavoring to represent.

I may differ with many of my friends on both sides of this House, but my convictions are from an honest heart and a desire to do something that will remove a great and an unjust burden that rests upon the people of the country, and upon none with a heavier and more oppressive hand than upon farmers, producers, and laboring men, who can not come to Congress to lobby for relief, nor can they employ counsel to advocate their claims for relief, but must depend upon the slow and tardy action of Congress. On the 1st day of April the report of the Secretary of the Treasury showed a surplus of available cash in the Treasury of more than $150,000,000, with more than $400,000,000 cash in the Treasury, with a surplus over demands flowing into the Treasury annually of about $120,000,000, and with collections wrung from the pockets of our constituents of more than $1,000,000 per day.

Now, with these facts before us, it is conceded on all sides that we should reduce taxation to such an extent as the revenues will be ample to pay the ordinary expenses of the Government economically administered, pay pensions, and pay our bonded indebtedness as it matures. Then how shall we reduce it, and by reducing taxation relieve the people of the burdens above referred to? In my opinion the best way to do so is to abolish the entire internal-revenue system. The country demands and expects this Congress to meet and dispose of this issue, to cease collecting this large surplus that goes into the Treasury and is there hoarded up as a temptation to extravagant legislation, fraud, and corruption. I have been a steadfast advocate of this proposition ever since a surplus was being collected, and now, when the surplus is growing and the demands upon the Treasury are growing less by diminishing the public debt, by reducing interest and the payments of the arrears of pensions, it is the best time we have ever had to abolish the entire system.

Some honorable gentlemen argue that they will never vote for free whisky with a tax upon sugar and salt. I do not advocate free whisky. If it was in my power to do so, I would prohibit the use of whisky or any intoxicating drink as a beverage; but that is an impossibility and should not now be discussed.

When a bill was brought into the House by the Ways and Means Committee of the Forty-seventh Congress to reduce internal taxation, I had strong hopes that we could accomplish much more than was done by that bill, but was disappointed. Our Republican friends, who brought in that bill, made a great flourish of trumpets as to what they would do to reduce taxation, and they are entitled to the gratitude of the world for their liberality and magnanimity in removing the 1-cent stamp on matches, 2-cent stamp on patent medicines, 2-cent stamp on bank-checks and upon bank capital and deposits; and by hard pleading by the friends of the farmer we did prevail upon them to let a farmer or producer of tobacco sell one hundred dollars' worth of his own production of tobacco without paying a license tax, but they refused to allow him to remove his tobacco from the place of production in order to find a purchaser. This they considered magnanimous to the farmer.

They then began a revision of the tariff with an assurance that they would make large reductions as recommended by that humbugging Tariff Commission. And among their first efforts was to show their friendship for the agricultural industries by knocking the tariff down upon American wool without a corresponding reduction upon woolen manufactures; in other words, they struck down American wool to enable the American manufacturer to make the better profits upon his manufactured goods. And when they had forced their tariff bill through the House under the gag and with much labor and tribulation, and then when the calm after the storm has come and a close examination as to the effects of the tariff reduction, we find that the reduction upon an average is only about 2 per cent. But then they had accomplished a great work. Instead of abolishing the entire internal-revenue law, as they should have done, they had relieved the poor distressed banks, whose annual net profits are about $40,000,000, of the tax upon deposits, circulation, and checks. They had relieved the manufacturer of matches of 1 cent per box, and patent medicines 2 cents per bottle, all of these reductions inuring to the benefit of the banks and manufacturers. They did not touch an article that abolished an office or saved a dollar in the expense of collecting. That was in keeping with that party. So long as they have been in power they have not shown a disposition to abolish an office or curtail expenditures in the administration of affairs.

And now the question is brought squarely before this Democratic House as to the best means to reduce taxation and reduce the large surplus that is daily flowing into the Treasury. Some disposition of this kind is an imperative duty upon this Congress. It is our duty to meet the issue, and we should do so at once and save the tax-payers from the unnecessary burdens resting upon them.

My convictions as to the best means to get rid of this surplus and to reduce taxation to the demands of the Government, economically administered, are well known by every member of this House who served in the three last preceding Congresses. I have given the subject a thorough consideration and feel a very great interest in the subject, because my constituents are interested, and I believe the total abolition of all internal taxation would be one of the very best moves that could be made by the Democratic party.

Internal taxation has never been resorted to by our Government except as a war measure. It was always obnoxious to the masses and was repealed at the very earliest day possible. And now, nearly twenty years after our late civil war, with a Treasury full and overflowing with money, there can be no valid reason for continuing the law. I may differ with many of my good Democratic friends upon this subject; nevertheless I claim the right to judge for myself and for those who sent me here. I have as much faith in the ultimate success of the Democratic party as any one here, and I propose to stand by my party and do battle for her triumph. If a majority of my party differ with me it does not discourage me; nor will it drive me from the party. I will always go with my party in everything that tends to promote its success or that will benefit the country. And if I choose to differ with some on grave questions, it will be a difference of opinion only, and will in no wise alienate me from the party. My only regret on this point is that we can not all see alike, that we could have no party divisions.

But as the question how best to go about reducing taxation and revenue is before us, I, like many others, have my views, and I propose to advocate them, let the consequences be what they may. Personally I have very little feeling upon the subject, but I know those whom I represent have a great interest at stake, and knowing this increases my desires upon the subject.

There are but two propositions to reduce taxation: one is the abolition of the internal taxes, and the other is by a reduction of the tariff; and I propose to show that it is better to reduce taxation by abolishing internal-revenue taxation and let the tariff alone for the present. If it is an odious tariff, the Republican party are responsible for it, and I am willing to give it a fair trial without indorsing any of its unjust discriminations. If we scale the tariff as proposed by the honorable Committee on Ways and Means, we are not certain as to its effects. We do not know whether it will increase or diminish the revenue, when we want to reduce the revenue. If by reducing the tariff rates as proposed in that bill it increases the importations in a corresponding ratio, we will have as much revenue as now; but if the importations remain the same as now, of course there will be a reduction of revenue to that extent; but no human being can tell how that will be, whether the tariff bill reported will increase or diminish the revenue. A scaling tariff duty will not save a dollar's expense in the collection, as it costs as much to collect a low tariff duty as it does a high one.

Upon the other hand, if we will abolish the internal-revenue law we know exactly what we are doing. We know that we will reduce the revenue about $120,000,000 annually. We know that we will save over $5,000,000 paid annually to over 5,000 internal-revenue officers employed to collect it; and at least five millions more that is paid out annually in costs, fees of professional witnesses, spies, informers, marshals, attorneys, and others. Thus at one swoop we would save at least $10,000,000 in salaries and expenses, which could be added to other receipts of the Government. The repeal of this law would rid the country of many thousand men employed in the execution of the law who care for nothing save the money they can make out of it, whether honestly or not, and who are a curse to the country and a disgrace to the Government. Do this and the people who have been harassed and bedeviled by this class of men will once more feel like free and independent American citizens.

The Ways and Means Committee a few weeks ago reported their first relief bill to this House in the shape of a bill extending the period for whisky in bond to five years, and that being a bill of great importance alone to the distiller and wholesale dealer, it took precedence and we consumed one entire week in listening to speeches for and against the bill; and every speech and argument used in favor of the passage of that bill was that the Treasury was full and the country or the Government did not need the money. If that is true, why keep the law upon the statute-books? Why not repeal or abolish the law and stop collecting this tax, that is admitted upon all hands is unnecessary? The plea that there was an overproduction was not a good one, and one that Congress could not entertain. If they did the manufacturer of iron and other products might follow the example, as they doubtless would, and claim relief from Congress by reason of overproduction, and claim that prices were not regulated by supply and demand. Every argument used by the friends of the bond-extension bill confirms me in my opinions as to the necessity of repealing the law.

As stated before, I am no advocate for free whisky; but I want to get rid of this curse upon the country. Turn the whole question over to the States; let them levy and collect a tax by their State officers upon the manufacture and sale of spirits; give grand juries inquisitorial powers to prevent frauds, and by this means they could raise a very large revenue which they could add to their school fund or deduct it from taxes upon real estate and other property. It would be a great source of State revenue to many of the States that would be glad to levy and collect such a tax, and I have no doubt every State where it is manufactured would avail itself of the benefits of such a law.

If the honorable gentlemen comprising the Committee on Ways and Means will heed the appeals made to them by the people oppressed by the law, they would soon report a bill, if not to repeal or to abolish the law, to change and simplify the collection of these taxes, and thereby greatly reduce the expenses of collection and prevent the many outrages perpetrated upon people of the country by unprincipled subordinates employed in its execution. If in their judgment Congress can not abolish the entire system, then let them report a bill coming half way by abolishing all of the small privilege taxes; also the tax upon tobacco, cigars, and snuff, and upon distilleries used exclusively for the distillation of fruits and berries. This would reduce internal revenue about $26,000,000 per annum, as shown by a statement furnished me by the honorable Commissioner of Internal Revenue, which shows that the receipts from fruit distilleries for the first seven months of this fiscal year were only $716,461.20; from tobacco, all sources, $14,938,905.39. Now, this reduction can safely be made, and if the tariff bill should make a reduction of even forty millions there would be no deficit in revenue. Even this much would be of vast benefit to the people of the country. It would relieve owners of orchards of a great embarrassment, would encourage the growth and culture of fruit, and would in no wise increase the consumption of spirits as a beverage.

The report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shows a list of officers consisting of 126 collectors, 981 deputy collectors, 852 gaugers, 1,855 storekeepers, 1,435 clerks and other employés, and 35 inspectors of tobacco—in all, 5,284—enough to form a respectable brigade of office-holders, employed to execute a law that is now unnecessary. Besides the above there are thousands of deputy marshals, United States commissioners, professional witnesses, informers, and spies, who live entirely by the pickings afforded them by this law, and who should be made to go to work for a living. The Commissioner's report makes a favorable report as to the expense of collecting this revenue in the main, but when you come to look at the cost of collection by district, and get a little farther away from the Department, every one is bound to admit there is a great waste of public money for which no valid excuse can be given.

Take Tennessee, for instance: the second collection district collected $119,241.32 revenue, at a cost of $33,240.68, or about 28 per cent.; the fifth collection district collected $979,279.85, at a cost for collecting of $93,686.58—nearly 10 per cent.; the eighth collection district collected $75,369.12, at a cost of $12,004.51, or 16 per cent. In the second Georgia district the cost of collecting was 23 per cent., and in the third Georgia district it was 25 per cent. In the second Alabama district the cost of collecting was 31 per cent. In the second North Carolina district the cost of collection was 33 per cent., and in the sixth North Carolina district it was 40 per cent. Now, with these facts before us, with a large surplus in the Treasury, are we justified in keeping such a law upon the statute-books? There is no excuse for it, unless it be expressly for the purpose of giving away the revenue thus collected to an army of office-holders, because no sane man will argue that this large expenditure is necessary. In addition to this heavy expense, look at the cost, trouble, and expense this law, executed as it is by such a class of men in the interior, entails upon the people of the country who are charged with its violation.

I could find hundreds of instances of outrages that have been perpetrated by these pretended officials upon honest, unoffending citizens purely for the purpose of black-mail and fees. Then, is it good policy to keep such a law upon the statutes, a law that is more abused than any in existence, all when we do not need the money? And right here, in reply to the idea that this large expenditure was necessary to suppress moonshining, I desire to say that all the moonshiners in the country together have not swindled the Government out of half as much as have the regularly licensed distillers. I do not mean to charge that they all do so, or that any do now, but that such has been the case, as was proven in the whisky-ring scandal a few years ago. The Commissioner's report shows suits began for violations of internal revenue in the year 1883 to be 4,558. Each suit of this character will cost the defendant, if acquitted, at least $50 in counsel fees, traveling and other expenses, and if convicted it will cost him not less than $100, making upon an average thirty or forty thousand dollars per annum wrung from the pockets of a class of people usually poor and unable to bear such expenses, and generally not well informed as to the law. All of this money goes into the pockets of the Shylocks, who are thus seeking their pound of flesh.

Take the above number of suits and costs for the past ten years, and you have 45,000 suits, at a cost to the defendants of three or four hundred thousand dollars, all with a Treasury full of money. On the second Monday in January last the United States court met at Knoxville. It was a cold, wintry day, with a deep snow on the ground. There were present three hundred and twenty-five witnesses and one hundred and fifty defendants, all ruthlessly dragged away from their homes and their families during that severe wintry weather by the United States marshals upon charges of a violation of the internal-revenue law. And when the district judge learned that a majority of the defendants had been arrested for buying and selling Saint Jerome's Bitters and Hostetter's Bitters he instructed the grand jury not to find any true bills, and told the parties thus arrested to go home. But that did not pay for the humiliation of being arrested and carried off fifty to seventy-five miles to court, their expenses, and counsel fees. This is a sample of the way in which the law is executed throughout the South. Then, is it any wonder that the people clamor for its repeal? It is generally in the South executed by men of little character and less regard for the law and justice.

There were 3,036 suits dismissed last year. The Government or the defendants have the costs to pay. There were pending 1st July last 3,227 suits. The expenses of the Department of Justice last year were nearly $3,000,000. And it was not all paid to star-route attorneys at one to two hundred dollars per day, but it is reasonable to suppose that large sums of this expenditure went to district attorneys and others on these frivolous prosecutions in internal-revenue cases against a poor class of people, generally unable to pay counsel fees.

The authorities deal very harshly with the people in the interior for very trifling offenses, much more so than it does with men for greater ones. It has not been very long since an officer in this city, holding a high and honorable position, was found to be a defaulter (not to use a harsher name) to the amount of $150,000. He was arrested and imprisoned for a few weeks and then turned loose in this city in broad daylight by a United States deputy marshal, and apparently no effort made to recapture him. I allude to Captain Howgate. I am no apologist for any law-breaker, but my opinion is if Captain Howgate had been a common countryman he would to-day be undergoing a long sentence in some penitentiary.

The reports show the convictions last year for violations of internal-revenue law to be 2,664; acquittals, 600; nolled or quashed, 1,400. All this trouble, expense, and litigation when we do not want the money! Now, I say let us repeal the entire law, raise money enough to run the Government by import dues, and if at any time it should be necessary to raise more revenue, then it would be easy to place a small income tax upon the wealth of the country, its rich banks and bankers, railroads, manufacturers, bondholders, and the like, and not be making the poor of the country pay all of the taxes while there is so much wealth in the country untaxed. The national banks and railroads built by land grants and subsidies are the creatures of Congress. They are all protected by the strong arm of the law. The annual profits of this untaxed wealth is more than a thousand millions of dollars per annum, and still they do not pay a dollar toward defraying the expenses of the Government, while every dollar of internal-revenue tax is collected directly from the products of labor and the soil. This is all wrong, and there is no better time to right this wrong than now.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, the time which my colleague from Tennessee, General DIBRELL, has so kindly given me I shall not devote to the present bill, but shall speak to a subject that is fraught with more importance to the agriculturists of this country than the bill now before the committee. The people that I have the honor to represent are largely engaged in agriculture, and I most cheerfully give my support to any measure that has for its object the advancement of their interests or the amelioration of their legislative burdens. And, Mr. Chairman, the majority report on House bill No. 5893, "to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes," most clearly evidences that they appreciate the wants of the overburdened laboring masses of this nation. And let me say here that while this bill does not give that equalization to the impost inequalities of the existing tariff rates I think should be given, yet I believe it to be a move in the right direction and shall give it my hearty support.

When the fall elections in 1880 were over and the results had been ascertained, it was found that the party which had been in power during the Forty-fourth, Forty-fifth, and Forty-sixth Congresses had been defeated; that the people had again placed in power the Republican party. Democracy had won the Forty-fourth and two succeeding Houses upon the issues of promised economy in the administration of governmental affairs and reduction of tariff duties. Its promises of economy it faithfully kept, but signally failed to reduce the tariff rates, for which they were rebuked with defeat by the people in the elections of 1880. The Republicans of the Forty-seventh Congress, having felt the pulse of the people upon this question of revenue reform, thought to profit by the defeat that had overtaken Democracy, and conceived the idea of a tariff commission, which they carried into effect, and assumed the rôle of Democracy previous to the 1880 election.

During the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress an act was passed creating the Tariff Commission, giving the selection and appointment of those to constitute it to the President. In the selection of its members the great masses of the people hoped the President would recognize some other than the "infant industries," but this hope they saw dissipated in the make-up of its members. From center to circumference of this broad land of ours went this rara avis of the Republican party, and upon its wide-spreading pinions, in gilded letters, the laboring masses read, "Tariff reduction; tariff reform." But upon the floor of this House, before full-fledged, some daring Democrat had written upon its caudal appendage, "Fraud." I will not follow this "bird of ill-omen" in its wanderings during the summer and fall months of 1882 amid the smoke of the "infant industry" of the great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, nor the waving, golden sugar-cane of Louisiana, or the "silver-threaded infant" of California.

The elections of 1882 came and passed. The people of the nation had studied well this creature of Republicanism, and in it they saw no good. They had seen the brand put upon it by Democracy, and in their sovereign will they repudiated both it and its paternal ancestors, and when in December, 1882, its fathers met in the place of its birth it rendered to them an account of its experiences and gathered knowledge. The result we have in the present tariff rates. And although this creation of the Republican party now sleeps with leaden eyes, the brand Democracy stamped upon it when given its being is now shadowed in this House in 1.74. Mr. Chairman, it is not because the Democratic party stands pledged to the country to modify the present tariff duties to suit the necessities of the laboring classes that I favor this bill, but because those laboring classes need it and it is just in an economic administration of the Government. The commission appointed by the President, at the behest of the last Congress, acknowledged that—

> A substantial reduction is demanded, not by a mere indiscriminate popular clamor, but by the best conservative opinion of the country. Such a reduction of the existing tariff the commission regards not only as a due recognition of public sentiment and a measure of justice to consumers, but one conducive to the general industrial prosperity, and which, though it may be temporarily inconvenient, will be ultimately beneficial to the special interests affected by such reduction.

If that language clothed a truth in 1883, it is no less the truth in 1884. The political character of this House, coming as its members do fresh from the people, is a demonstration of that "demand by the best conservative opinion of the country," demonstrating that the demand was for a trial of the Democratic policy of a revenue tariff simply sufficient to support an economic administration of the Government, evidencing they had tired of the policy of the Republican party which had been on trial for twenty years under the denomination of protected and incorporated capital, the few against the many. That "popular demand" could not be ignored. The Republican House of the Forty-seventh Congress tried it and the people cast them out, to fill their places with Democrats, upon the old familiar slogan, not of free-trade but of tariff for revenue and an economic administration of government. And should that party abuse the confidence of the masses, they in turn will have to give place to a new party—a party of and for the people.

In their power and majesty they have spoken, and say no longer shall $2,000,000,000 be wrung from agriculturists and laborers to enrich a few monopolists and capitalists. The substantial reduction promised in the tariff by that commission is not to be found in its practical workings; the present is not a reduction in the tariff it promised to reduce. The tariff of 1863, which it promised to reduce, is not an improvement, not even in toto a modification of the old one. After its first six months' working we find it made a reduction of just 1.74 per cent. on the $100 value of imported goods over the old law, after promising 20 and probably 25 per cent. reduction in rates. December 31, 1883, the first six months of the present tariff, the dutiable merchandise imported into the United States, valued at $235,898,109, paid duties amounting to $96,574,136, which was 40.91 per cent. on the value. Under the operation of the old law, during the corresponding period of 1882, there was collected, as duties on $260,856,273 of imported dutiable goods, $111,265,507, or 42.65 per cent. on the value—a difference of just 1.74 less under the new law.

Thus we find, after all the promises of that commission and of that Republican Congress, there is in reality no reduction to amount to anything. The substantial reduction they admitted as demanded by the best conservative opinion of the country is still demanded. The poor man's life necessaries are still taxed higher than the luxuries of the rich; flannel higher than their velvet and laces; coarse blankets higher than broadcloth; medicine from 30 to 200 per cent., but champagne only 46 per cent., and in like proportion are the absolute necessaries of the farmers and laborers of this country discriminated against and in favor of the rich. By the old tariff the poor pay more than double what the rich do, and by the present tariff there is only a difference of 1.74 per cent. on the dollar in their favor, where 20 to 25 per cent. was acknowledged to be demanded.

Mr. Chairman, what has been the policy of the Democratic party in the past? No better evidences can be given of what it was and has been than to take the utterances of its then leaders, whose mighty minds shaped the policy of the party and whose guiding hands carried it far out upon the high seas of national prosperity—a policy that gave adequate encouragement to American industries and plenty to the farmers and laborers of the nation and made the land to bloom and blossom as a rose. Mr. Buchanan, in discussing the tariff of 1824, said:

> I will never consent to adopt a general restrictive system, because the agricultural class of the community would then be left at the mercy of the manufacturers. The interests of the many would then be sacrificed to promote the wealth of the few. The farmer, in addition to the premium which he would be compelled to pay the manufacturer, would have also to sustain the expenses of the Government.

Mr. Polk, in his first inaugural address, delivered on the 4th of March, 1845, said:

> In exercising a sound discretion in levying discriminating duties within the limit prescribed, care should be taken that it be done in a manner not to benefit the wealthy few at the expense of the toiling millions by taxing lowest the luxuries of life, or articles of superior quality and high price, which can only be consumed by the wealthy, and highest the necessaries of life, or articles of coarse quality and low price, which the poor and great mass of our people consume.

Sirs, what Mr. Buchanan and Mr. Polk said should never be done has for twenty years, in its iniquitous effects, been taking from the poor and needy of this fair land the fruits of their toil, and turning them into the coffers of the wealthy few, making the poor poorer and the rich richer. Look to-day at the prostrate condition of agriculture and labor. Go among the laborers of the protected industries. Do we find happiness, plenty? No, sirs; but we find here want in every guise haunting the wretched homes of their still more wretched occupants, for under the exactions of protection home to them is an alien word, and often even in winter's chilling blasts, under the heartless command of protection, have they gone forth into darkness, leaving a worse midnight behind. Upon the other hand, we find that this robber system has given millions to the favored few, but every dollar in these vast fortunes has been wrested from labor and been moistened with the sweat of toil. Mr. Chairman, some facts but recently given before the Committee on Labor I incorporate as a part of my remarks.

Mr. T. V. Powderly, of Scranton, Pa., master workman of the Knights of Labor of the United States, representing 500,000 workingmen, who are interested in several bills which are before Congress, testified as follows:

> I am interested in the eight-hour law, the land bill, and bill on imported labor under contract introduced by Mr. FORAN. These imported men show no disposition to become citizens of this country, but, on the contrary, seek to obtain a certain sum of money, which they consider a competence, and with it return to Italy or Hungary. I have seen eight of these people and one women living in a small house, without beds or furniture, sleeping on the floor, and have been informed by reliable authority that these nine persons' expenses for one month was only $27. I have seen them in the Frostburg region of Maryland, where they had been brought by agents who engaged them at Castle Garden, living in a wooden building, sleeping on bunks, this building being fenced in to prevent them being communicated with by the people whose places they had taken. The diet of these men was water and mush, with a small quantity of meat on Sunday. These men are brought into competition with skilled as well as unskilled labor, and it is fast becoming as bad as the competition of the Chinese in the West. A demand is now going up for an amendment of the Chinese bill in such particulars as it has been shown deficient.

William Leech, of Malaga, N. J., of the W. G. W. A., said:

> I was at Malaga last year when certain Belgians were brought to that place. It was our duty to find out from them if the situation of affairs at Malaga had been made known to them before they came, or whether it had not been misrepresented to them. When we attempted to obtain this information the company had thirty-five of us enjoined by the courts from interfering with them. The window-glass workers were ordered out of their homes in midwinter and compelled to move. Last spring we went to work, the Belgians in one factory and the citizens in another. They have since left Malaga, the firm having changed managers.

Emile Bouillet, of Zanesville, Ohio, W. G. W. A., said:

> I was hired at Antwerp by an agent of Dean F. Williams, of Zanesville, Ohio, who came for a set of men (sixty). When I went to see him I asked him why he came to Europe for men. He replied "that men were scarce and work plenty in the United States." I told him we would expect the same wages paid in the United States. He said "they would pay the New York tariff." When we arrived at Zanesville we discovered that the New York tariff was 25 per cent. less than the regular price. I complained to the company of this misrepresentation, and they answered that "they did not authorize the payment of more than what they were then paying." At Kent the company did not pay the price agreed upon. They brought them to Kent on a contract for three years. The men were not permitted to associate with American workingmen lest they might find out the true state of affairs. Two of these men were arrested and put in jail for some days for violating this contract. When we arrived, a friend of one of us was met by a man whom he knew in Europe. As soon as they commenced to talk the manager ordered the arrest of the party. When we arrived at Mansfield, Ohio, a member of the firm came into the car and inquired if any of us could speak English; I answered that "my father and I could." He then warned us not to talk to the men.
> Question by member of committee. What is the difference between the wages paid these foreigners and Americans?
> Answer by John Schlicker. Between 28 and 50 per cent.

William F. Barclay, representing the miners of the coke region of Pennsylvania, said:

> I never knew one of these men to stay in the country. They spend comparatively nothing, saving their money to return home; even when sick they go to the poor-house, until at last the authorities refused to longer entertain them while they had money. They will eat anything. They hang their meat out in the sun that it may become soft and tainted. The business men of the region are opposed to them. They get the same wages as the Americans, except when they work by the day, then they are paid 33 per cent. less, which is all they are worth. This importation has reduced the price of mining, and makes it impossible for the men to do other than submit to whatever the operators demand or require of them, regardless of its justness. The condition of the miners and coke-makers generally is aggravated by the company stores which abound in this district. I priced potatoes before I left and could have bought them of an outside dealer for 50 cents per bushel, while the price in the company stores is 80 cents per bushel. If the men do not deal in the store, they are discharged.

Mr. Barclay also furnished the committee with the following written statement:

We have the following evidence that the importation of laborers under contract does exist. The captain of the vessel on which Joseph Welsh, brother of Hon. John Welsh, ex-member of the Pennsylvania Legislature, came to the United States informed him that the large number of Slavonians on board the vessel were imported laborers shipped to America under contract; that the importers had made a special contract with the steamship company at a very low rate for their delivery in the United States, and that their accommodation would be in accordance with the rates, and that should he (Mr. Welsh) not receive the proper care he should complain to him (the captain). I have this from Mr. Welsh himself. We have much other evidence of their being imported by special agreement to work for certain firms. We have discovered an agency at work engaged in the business of importing laborers, agents in Europe gathering the men, an agent in New York receiving them and forwarding them to destinations. I have in my possession evidence that a firm having a branch in the city of Pittsburgh is engaged in this business. E. Dorner & Co. is the name of the firm who have received a certain amount per head for such imported laborers.

William Ashton, of Philadelphia, Pa., W. G. W. A., said:

My information is in regard to importation of foreigners to Baltimore, Md. These men were brought under a contract; they were window-glass blowers. The first importation took place in 1879; forty-eight were then brought over by Swindell Brothers. The following year Baker Brothers imported seventeen, King Brothers twenty-two, and Swindell Brothers twenty-three. The first importation occurred during a strike; there was no strike when the second importation occurred. Some of the foreigners refused to work and were arrested, but discharged before a hearing was had; their clothing was retained by the firm and it was weeks before they could secure it. They were kept locked in houses when not working, and could not be seen by the Americans. Most of them have since returned home, some being sent by the glass-blowers' association and some by the Belgian consul, who complained bitterly of the treatment they received. The effect of their importation was the reduction of wages about 12 per cent. An injunction was issued against the American workmen from interfering with them and made perpetual by Judge Brown, of Baltimore. Before these men were imported we had as good a set of American workmen as could be found anywhere. The system in vogue in Europe and America differs materially. The Europeans work according to old methods and processes; in fact, they bring their tools and molds with them. The European workman can not turn out within 35 per cent. as much ware as the American workman, and as a result do not or are not able to fulfill their contract; hence the employers are at liberty to pay them what they please.

Val Haas, Baltimore, Md., W. G. W. A., said:

The situation was misrepresented to them; some of them, when the exact situation was explained to them, quit. Two Germans who quit work were refused their clothes and were arrested. I have been called up at night by these men to explain to them the trouble, as we could not get near them or they near us, so that an understanding might be had. They were under constant police surveillance, and we were enjoined from interfering with them. These foreigners were natives of France, Belgium, and Germany; they were brought in three different parties. In 1879 Baker Brothers brought forty-eight and King Brothers twenty-five. Baker Brothers brought a second lot of twenty-five and King Brothers and Swindell Brothers twenty-three. Previous to this last importation there was no strike. Some of these men are here yet; others have gone away. The effect has been a 12 per cent. reduction of wages.

Charles Leffler, Baltimore, Md., W. G. W. A., said:

My statement is substantially the same as Messrs. Ashton and Haas. Mr. Swindell says he does not want the foreigners any more; they accomplished the object intended, the reduction of wages.

Mr. A. C. Robertson, of Pittsburgh, Pa., said:

The number of foreign glass-bottle blowers brought to the Western States under contract is about eighty in all, distributed in five factories, namely: La Salle, Ill., thirty-six; Covington, Ky., thirteen; Louisville, Ky., fourteen; the balance in Streator, Ill., and New Albany, Ind. They receive about 40 per cent. less wages than American blowers; or, in other words, they get 8 cents per dozen for quart beers, while the American gets 13 cents per dozen. The effect of this competition will be to bring the native workmen down to the level of pauper labor. The hollow-glass workmen west of the Alleghany Mountains have not worked since last June. They have been during all this time enjoying the luxury of a lockout. Last year's revision of the tariff virtually increased the duty on green glassware nearly 100 per cent.; but notwithstanding this increase the manufacturers are endeavoring to force a reduction of 20 per cent. in wages. Previous to the revision there was an importation of about 200,000 gross of bottles. Since the new tariff went into effect there has been scarcely any importation of this ware. Two American blowers will turn out eighty dozen bottles per day, while two of the foreign blowers turn out but fifty dozen per day. The manufacturers seem to favor free trade in labor and a high protective tariff upon their manufactured goods or wares.

I here give, Mr. Chairman, the statement of Mr. Nimmo of the act of March 3, 1883.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS, March 10, 1884.

JOSEPH NIMMO, JR., Chief of Bureau.

From which it will be seen that on many of the articles of imported goods the tariff rates were increased, while, on the other hand, nearly all of the manufacturers have reduced the wages of their employés from 10 to 20 per cent. We hear almost on every side that if Congress reduces the present tariff rates the manufacturers will "shut up shop." This, Mr. Chairman, is the bugbear with which they hope to bulldoze this House into longer permitting this onerous and unjust system to go unrevised, and thereby continue their enormous profits. Who suffers from overproduction and the closing down of the factories, the laborers or the owners? I let Mr. Swank, the secretary of the American Iron and Steel Association, answer this question, as given in his May report, 1883, for the year 1882, when he said:

At the beginning of June nearly all the mills referred to (rolling-mills in Pittsburgh and the West) were closed by a general strike, which continued until the last of September, when work was resumed upon the scale of wages which had previously prevailed. During the strike of four months the prices of rolled iron did not advance, notwithstanding the stoppage of so many mills; a fact which clearly demonstrated that the capacity to produce this form of iron had again, as in the panic years, exceeded the demand. At the same time it must be frankly admitted that our rolling-mill capacity has for some time been in advance of the consumptive wants of the country, and that, through the check to the overproduction of rolled iron which was afforded by the strike of 1882, it was in no sense a calamity to the manufacturers."

Why is it that depression assails the workman instead of the employer? Upon what principle of political economy is this condition accounted for, except upon the fact that Republican policy tends to encourage monopolies while depressing labor? We may have had overproduction, but it has not produced bankruptcy; it has created wealth. As shown by the census of 1880, of over 50,000,000 people one-half were engaged in agriculture, and their aggregated wealth was $12,104,081,430, on which they now make a profit of only from 3 to 3½ per cent., while the manufacturers realize a profit of from 37 to 67 per cent.

Of what benefit is a protective tariff to the agriculturists of this country? The answer of the protectionists is: "By maintaining protection on other industries a larger domestic market will be created for the products of the farmer." Upon this proposition I join issue, for the light of history upon this question shows indisputably that with the increase of protection the home market has become less and less favorable to the agriculturists.

Production of wheat.

| Year. | Wheat produced. | Wheat exported. | Per cent. | Tariff rate per cent. |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| | Bushels. | Bushels | | |
| 1840 | 615,525,302 | 13,199,049 | 2.1 | 30 |
| 1850 | 867,453,967 | 15,951,635 | 1.9 | 24 |
| 1860 | 1,239,039,945 | 22,955,135 | 1.8 | 19 |
| 1870 | 1,629,027,600 | 57,290,529 | 3.5 | 43 |

These figures clearly show that the consumption of wheat (and the same applies to other agricultural products) in the home markets was greater under the tariffs of 1840 and under the revenue tariffs of 1855 and 1857–'60 than under the higher protective tariff of 1870. While in 1859–'60 the value of manufactured exports was 17.5 per cent. of the value of our total exports, in 1869–'70, under ten years of high-tariff policy, they were 13.4 per cent.; and in 1879–'80, after twenty years of high tariff, they were only 12.5 per cent. Agricultural products under the effects of that system have largely increased in exportation; manufactured products had run down to 12.5 per cent., showing conclusively that our great agricultural products—wheat, corn, cotton, rye, seeds, hay, beef, bacon, pork, lard, butter, cheese, &c.—which we are forced to export in value to hundreds of millions of dollars annually, can not be benefited by any tariff. The value of surplus agricultural products that for want of a home demand had to seek a foreign market were as shown in the following table.

Mr. Chairman, the manufacturing States, as shown by the Tenth Census and still later statistical reports, produce a sufficiency of provisions to support the manufacturers and the laborers engaged in their factories. They do not now, nor ever did, depend upon the great grain, swine, and cattle States. Mr. Nimmo, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, says the manufacturing States consume nearly all of their provisions, and neither export abroad nor furnish any considerable market for the grain-producing States; that the markets of the East are of no appreciable advantage to them. They must depend upon themselves and upon the markets of Europe. Mr. Nimmo states further that 95 per cent. of the exports of breadstuffs and provisions come from the West.

Take the manufacturing State of Pennsylvania. We find by the tenth census that her population was 4,282,891; that her production of wheat was 19,462,405 bushels; corn, 45,821,521 bushels; oats, 33,841,439 bushels; rye, 3,683,621 bushels; buckwheat, 3,593,326 bushels; Irish potatoes, 18,284,819 bushels. Take the first item, wheat, and at the average consumption of 4⅔ bushels per capita Pennsylvania had raised wheat enough for her own demand, and taking the average consumption per capita of her other productions we find she was independent of the outside world.

We have the word of Mr. Nimmo that none of the manufacturing States export their provisions. America produces more largely than any other country in the world of wheat, corn, cotton, oats, beef, pork, and mutton, and the claim of the protectionists that a protective tariff enhances the price of these products is not proven by the history of tariff legislation in this country.

Will any gentleman upon the floor of this House dispute this proposition: that the money of the farmer comes from his surplus crops; that his wheat, corn, &c., are so much money to him; that his income is based upon the surplus yield of his farm; that his profit is determined by the price of the articles in the market in which he is forced to sell? No considerable class of American farmers are or can be benefited or protected by the present high-tariff duties.

We find by the report of Mr. Nimmo for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, that the total value of the exports of domestic merchandise was $804,223,632, and that of this sum $619,269,449 were the products of agriculture, being 77 per cent. of the entire exports coming directly in competition with the pauper labor of Russia and of India, where wages were only a few cents a day.

What resulting benefits do the farmer laborers of America receive from a protective tariff? None; for the inexorable law of supply and demand, not a protective tariff, fixes the price of labor and of the products of agriculture. The price of agricultural labor is controlled by the price received for the surplus products of the labor employed.

Mr. Chairman, as to the effect of protection upon both agricultural and manufacturing wages there is most ample evidence in Europe and in America prior to 1860. France, not only one of the finest countries in the Old World, but with a population whose innate love of their beautiful land binds them to her soil, had a protective tariff which she greatly modified, and wages advanced 30 per cent.; and when in 1881 she raised her tariff to a protective scale wages began to fall, and we notice in almost every report from her shores that destitution and want are being most oppressively felt by her laborers. In our own country in 1829 the wages of farm laborers were from $7 to $10 per month. During the same period the wages of mechanics were from 50 cents to $1 per day. In 1842 the tariff rates were raised to an average of 41 per cent., and during the four years of its existence the wages in none of the industries were increased. In 1846, after the adoption of the Walker tariff, which reduced the rates to an average of 24 per cent., wages began to rise, and from 1846 to 1860 the census of 1860 says there was an advance in wages of employés in manufactures of 30 and in the wages of farm laborers of 50 per cent. From 1824 to 1836 and from 1842 to 1846 there was the highest protective rates ever given to or enjoyed by the iron industries in this country, and during these years of high protection the average wages of the employés did not exceed 88 cents a day. In 1846 the tariff rates upon iron were reduced about one-half, when wages began to advance, and when in 1860 there was a still further reduction of these duties the wages of these iron workmen were $1.25 a day; nor were the beneficent influences of this reduction confined to the workmen in the iron manufactures, but was appreciably felt by the employés in every class of manufactures.

In 1845 the average wages in the factories of Lowell, Mass., were $1.05; in 1859, $1.45 a day. In 1850 the average wages of factory employés were $248 a year, and in 1860, $289 a year. Under this system of tariff for revenue this country was blessed with what the distinguished Speaker of this House has justly called "the golden era in our history."

And in this connection I do not desire to ignore the fact that during the census year of 1880 average wages of manufacturing workmen were $346, which was due to an enormous demand for manufactures, which compelled the manufacturers to pay higher wages until this abnormal demand was supplied; and the claim of the protectionist that this system of protection tends to give a fixed and an increased wage rate to manufacturing laborers is still further and most forcibly refuted by the admission of the manufacturers, together with the evidence of their employés, that the average rate of wages in our manufacturing industries does not at the present time exceed $275 a year, while in 1860 it was $289 a year. The average tariff rate in 1884 is 40.91 per cent. In 1860 the average rate was less than 20 per cent. ad valorem.

By the census of 1880 the laborers in the cotton-mills of the United States received an average rate of $244, since which time there has been a 20 per cent. reduction, reducing their wages below $200 a year. The published reports of Secretary Frelinghuysen show the average annual wages of the employés in the English cotton mills to be $251 a year. It is an admitted fact that our native workmen are the most intelligent and skillful and give a larger return as the fruits of their labor than those of any other country. The last census tells us that the average production of American workmen in that year was $1,960 per capita, while the English workmen produced only an average of $780 per capita, and this fact is shown by Mr. Blaine, when Secretary of State, in a special report in 1881. And yet the American workman is receiving less for his labor than the Englishman. These are some of the evidences of the "great benefits" protection is conferring upon the labor of America.

The act of March 3, 1883, increased the duties on earthenware from 42.88 per cent. ad valorem under the old law to 47.85 under the new law, on glass and glassware from 54.49 per cent. ad valorem to 55.47 per cent. ad valorem, and on manufactures of wool the new law increases the ad valorem rate 2.19 per cent., and on manufactures of cotton they are increased 2.46 per cent. In the face of these facts each one of these protected industries has greatly reduced its wage rates. This is the way protection elevates American labor. And now, in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, as the most potent reason why this House should pass some bill giving relief to the agriculturists and laborers of this country, I here give the language of the President, in his message in December, 1882:

I heartily approve the Secretary's recommendation of immediate and extensive reductions in the annual revenues of the Government. It will be remembered that I urged upon the attention of Congress at its last session the importance of relieving the industry and enterprise from the pressure of unnecessary taxation. It is one of the tritest maxims of political economy that all taxes are burdensome, however wisely and prudently imposed. And though there have always been, among our people, wide differences of sentiment as to the best methods of raising the national revenues, and indeed as to the principles upon which taxation should be based, there has been substantial accord in the doctrine that only such taxes ought to be levied as are necessary for a wise and economical administration of the Government. Of late the public revenues have far exceeded that limit, and unless checked by appropriate legislation such excesses will continue to increase from year to year. For the fiscal year ended June 30, 1881, the surplus revenue amounted to $100,000,000; for the fiscal year ended 30th of June last the surplus was more than $145,000,000. The report of the Secretary shows what disposition has been made of these moneys. They have not only answered the requirements of the sinking fund, but have afforded a large balance applicable to other reductions of the public debt.

But I renew the expression of my conviction that such rapid extinguishment of the national indebtedness as is now taking place is by no means a cause for congratulations; it is a cause rather for serious apprehension. If it continues, it must be speedily followed by one of the evil results so clearly set forth in the report of the Secretary.

Either the surplus must lie idle in the Treasury, or the Government will be forced to buy, at market rates, its bonds not then redeemable, and which, under such circumstances, can not fail to command an enormous premium, or the swollen revenues will be devoted to extravagant expenditure, which, as experience has taught, is ever the bane of an overflowing Treasury.

It was made apparent, in the course of the animated discussions which this question aroused at the last session of Congress, that the policy of diminishing the revenue by reducing taxation commanded the general approval of the members of both Houses. I regret that because of conflicting views as to the best methods by which that policy should be made operative none of its benefits have as yet been reaped.

The popular voice, as spoken by the elections, demands a mitigation of this burden on the necessaries of the people. The depression in all branches of industry and in wages, under this extreme tariff, makes an imperative demand on the Democratic majority in this House for relief.

Mr. DIBRELL. I now yield to my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I am exceedingly obliged to my friend and colleague General DIBRELL, a member of the Committee on Agriculture, for his courtesy in yielding me a part of his allotted time in the discussion of the agricultural appropriation bill, now before the House. While I shall cheerfully vote for the bill on its final passage, I desire to state that the only difficulty I fear is that the several amounts proposed for the fiscal year may be too small. Thus the Department may be handicapped by an inadequacy of means to meet its necessities. I am a zealous advocate of liberal appropriations for meritorious demands and enterprises in the interest of agriculture, and think the wise policy to pursue is to be just to all industrial pursuits.

Beyond this, at present, I shall not discuss this measure; but desire to call the attention of the House to H. R. 1457, introduced by my distinguished friend from South Carolina [Mr. AIKEN], who is also a member of the Committee on Agriculture. That bill proposes an enlargement of the Department. In my opinion such enlargement is absolutely required, and will greatly appreciate its efficiency.

With the objects desired to be attained by the proposed legislation I am in perfect sympathy. The provisions of the same are a stride in the right direction. The bill proposes to enlarge the duties and responsibilities of the Commissioner of Agriculture, and to promote that official to the dignity and rank of a Cabinet position with a corresponding salary.

The first section provides for the establishment of a department of agriculture in the city of Washington. The second provides that there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a secretary of agriculture, to preside over said department of agriculture, who shall be equal in rank and pay to the Secretaries now constituting the Cabinet.

The question presents itself, Mr. Chairman, why should not this be done? Why should not the important agricultural interests, the producers of the country, those engaged in industrial pursuits, who number so great a proportion of our entire population, be more thoroughly and prominently recognized in the councils of the country, and their well-being properly represented and advanced? Just and merited recognition has been tardy and too long delayed. Now, sir, there is an increasing and imperative demand, which has ripened from an expressed desire that the great agricultural pursuits, which are the substratum of national prosperity and civilization, shall be placed upon a corresponding level with other like important positions, and indicate to the world that the Government recognizes to the fullest extent its obligations to those engaged in the various farming industries. It will be a pledge, an earnest that it is determined to foster and by wholesome legislation encourage this class of our population.

Thus far, Mr. Chairman, meager as has been the opportunities and facilities, and parsimonious as has been the appropriations, still under the supervision of the Commissioner of Agriculture wonderful and beneficial results have been accomplished. Our farming interests all over the nation commend with pride the efforts and achievements of the Commissioner, whose indomitable energy and perseverance have accomplished such invaluable results. These results are seen in disseminating intelligence of a beneficial character concerning agriculture, and also such scientific matters associated with its industrial pursuits. Great benefit has been derived from the presentation and publication of valuable statistical information, upon all the important variety of industries which are intimately allied with agriculture.

The prime importance of this question has been and is being fully realized. In quite a number if not in all the States of the Federal Union, the Legislatures have created under ample constitutional warranty the office of Commissioner of Agriculture. He is appointed by the executive and constitutes a member of the gubernatorial staff. These commissioners are working with commendable zeal to promote the interests of their respective States. They are securing and furnishing information and suggestions promulgated by and emanating from practical farmers, upon the cultivation of the various products, and the adaptability of soil and climate for their culture.

In many of the States conventions are held, discussions had upon all questions relating to farming, involving the time and manner of planting and sowing, the proper cultivation, and the surest and most abundant crop. These State commissioners, being alive to their great responsibility, have crop reporters of representative, practical agriculturists, not theorists merely, who make monthly reports and statements of crops, of the final yield, accompanied with suggestions as to cultivation, and such practical information as shall tend to increase the profits of the farm. Their views, gathered from the experience of quite a number, located in different sections, in regard to the various methods of planting and the crops most profitable and preferable, the varieties, &c., are published, and are manifestly of great importance to the great body of the people.

Unusual interest is being manifested in all the States, and an activity developed heretofore unprecedented. Is it not therefore proper that the agricultural commissioners of the respective States should have a Federal head, a Secretary in the Cabinet of the Chief Executive? Is it not right to have a chief who can represent the varied and vital interests of the body of farmers and laboring men in the councils of the nation? Such a secretary should be selected from the practical agriculturists, and not from theorists merely or politicians.

The department if created should have for its ultimate object the utility and benefit of the particular industries represented—the men who till the soil, fell the forests, raise the subsistence of the continent, plant the orchard and the vine, raise the horses, cattle, sheep, and swine, and who have invested in these enterprises almost the wealth of the nation. They constitute that grand army of noblemen who are the creators of government, and when combined represent more than twelve thousand millions of capital. They contribute more to uphold and sustain the country's greatness and independence than all other classes. They are her pride and boast in time of peace, strength and reliance in time of war. They furnish a noble, sturdy, and invincible army of volunteers, jealous of the national honor and integrity, constituting not only its wealth and support in the detail of contributing taxes, but also its protection and defense in the hour of peril. We need more of them, and every incentive warranted by the Constitution should be given and exercised by the United States, as an inducement to encourage these agricultural industries, so essential to our national growth and prosperity.

The objection that this bill increases the number of the Cabinet and creates more patronage to be dispensed by the Executive is indeed unworthy as a reason of opposition to the passage of this measure. It is no sufficient response to the pressing demands of the age.

The hackneyed and oft abused demurrer as to the constitutionality of such progress can not be successfully urged. If it can, the argument applies with equal force to other Cabinet positions.

Nearly a century ago the Cabinet consisted of only three members, being the Secretaries of the Departments of State, Treasury, and War, and from time to time, as the exigencies of the times demanded, it has been increased to the present number. The Navy Department was organized in 1798, and not until 1829, under President Jackson, was a Postmaster-General invited to a seat in the Cabinet. In 1849 the Department of the Interior was inaugurated and the Secretary made a Cabinet officer. The Department of Justice was not established until the year 1870, the Attorney-General having, however, previously acted as a Cabinet officer, thus demonstrating that by the genius of our Government and the policy of our laws, when necessity arises, Congress has plenary power to legislate for the growing interests of the people under the Government. There is now an appeal, yea, a demand, for the creation of this portfolio, attended by such merits as commend themselves to our sense of justice, suggestive as a matter of urgency, that a department of agriculture should be established in the city of Washington.

Again, I recur to the inquiry, Mr. Chairman, why not make the head of the Agricultural Department a Cabinet officer? The cost attending the proposed legislation is insignificant when compared with the incalculable results. No objection in the oft-prostituted name of economy should be urged, when we consider that so much of the fixed capital in the United States is invested in agriculture and the industries connected with and dependent upon it for sustenance. Consider also that a large proportion of the taxes and revenues for the support of the Government are collected from 26,000,000 of our industrial population who are engaged and interested in agricultural and kindred industries for a living, and that the number is annually and rapidly augmenting.

By this great interest we are daily growing richer and more powerful. The vast amount of capital, the great number of our fellow-citizens, representing so much of our aggregated wealth, virtue, and intelligence, should not longer be denied official recognition to which they are so eminently entitled. Let it be represented by a secretary in the important councils of the nation, and thus the most honorable calling in our land will be elevated and encouraged.

The several branches of this pre-eminent industry present an inviting field for the exercise of learning and scientific development, for practical experience and a thorough and intelligent understanding and application of the subject. Consequently, a successful termination of this bill will contribute largely to an increase of information, practical, useful, and scientific, to the farmers of our Republic. They will be stimulated by valuable results, emanating from the practical suggestions of the Secretary, gathered from agricultural operations and reports from every section.

As was truthfully asserted by one of our Commissioners in 1875—

Farmers and planters now realize that there is something in this important work beyond the mere drudgery of sowing, reaping, and curing.

Men of science and learning, especially in these industrial interests, have given this subject much thought. They have furnished to the plainest comprehension intelligence that is valuable and instructive, which is being utilized in every community. The reason is apparent. Mr. Chairman, we have so much invested in these industries, so many dependent upon their success, such vast treasure and capital in live-stock, farms, and the products of the same, annually amounting to more than two and a quarter billions of dollars, that it overshadows all other avocations, and consequently commands, nay, demands, attention.

In their numerous and largely attended conventions all over the country, agriculturists are calling the attention of Congress to the investigation of the merits of their appeal. But recently, Mr. Chairman, the president of the National Agricultural Congress issued an address to the farmers of the United States, in which he states that the ultimate aim and purpose of the National Agricultural Congress is, first, to arouse agriculturists themselves to a realization of the national importance and prosperity of agriculture; and, secondly, to enforce a recognition of it upon the representatives of the people who have been delegated to administer the State and National Governments.

Reflecting the desire of the organization over which he presides, he says:

In order that agriculture may be placed upon an equitable footing in the executive branch of the Government, it is believed, and we should demand, that it should be represented in the Cabinet by a minister of equal influence, honor, and dignity with any and all other constitutional advisers of the President, to the end that its true relations to taxation, commerce, to finance, and all other great industries may be effectively studied and understood, and presented and defended with proper dignity and force in the councils of the nation.

This, Mr. Chairman, is the utterance of the body of the agriculturists, who constitute 57 per cent. of the population of the United States.

Our country, under the skilled and developing hand of chemical science in its best force, when harnessed to the car of progress for the cultivation of the soil, has become the great granary of the world. We export largely of our surplus to foreign ports, and receive millions of treasure in return. We produce and furnish more breadstuffs, grain, meats, stock of all kinds, provisions, cotton, and other products than any country on the inhabitable globe. We have an abundance for our 52,000,000 inhabitants. In fact ours is a land of plenty, pregnant with every desirable comfort and natural blessing, surrounded by and endowed with all the advantages that nature can bestow. We can now from our great abundance feed and clothe the entire world after caring for ourselves. Is it not a marvel?

Mr. Chairman, when we contemplate the vastness and greatness of our country, its splendid, unsurpassed, and inexhaustible resources, and the large proportion of our population engaged in agricultural industries, and the development of these resources, we are impressed with the imperative necessity of affording every constitutional facility for the accomplishment and promotion of the magnificent results which must flow, from a broader, more extended and liberal recognition and aid. The Government which has been fostered and protected, yea nurtured into greatness and opulence by the very people who now through their organizations ask that these additional facilities be afforded them, can not longer refuse their reasonable demands. As one of their representatives, and in their name, I earnestly ask for it.

The Federal Union is but promoting its own interest, and strengthening herself in the affection of the people; it is adding to her deserved wealth and influence by aiding with wholesome, salutary legislation the pursuits and industries contemplated in this measure. It is incumbent on us to make a departure, avoid the quicksands of the past, be more liberal in providing for the growth of our industries, and let them no longer occupy subordinate positions. Increase our facilities, make liberal appropriations for every needed enterprise. Only think, Mr. Chairman, that while France for agriculture and commerce appropriated over $20,000,000, Russia for agriculture and public lands nearly $15,000,000, Austria and Hungary for agriculture alone $5,500,000, Great Britain $800,000, Sweden $650,000, the United States, that outstrips all in productions and has more at stake, only appropriated for the same period about $174,686. It is our duty to do more in this respect. As an evidence of the rapidity with which our agricultural interests are increasing and the value of the same, I append herewith and invite your attention to a carefully prepared statement of the production, area, and value of the corn crop from 1871 to 1883, inclusive, following which is a table showing our exports and value of corn and corn-meal for said years, and a corresponding one of wheat.

When, sir, we consider the growth of this one commodity in our diversified farming, are we not irresistibly driven to the conclusion that it is marvelous? In thirteen calendar years the area of the corn crop has increased 34,000,000 acres, in round numbers, and doubling in 1883 the area in cultivation in 1871, with a corresponding increase in the yield and also in the value. The export of corn and corn-meal is a great source of revenue to our people, running as high in value as $54,279,604 in the year 1880. In addition to this source of accumulative wealth derived from agriculture alone, there was sown in 1882 18,494,691 acres in oats, yielding an average of 26.4 bushels per acre, and amounting in value to $182,978,022.

The succeeding statistics give an idea of the exports of preserved meats, pork products, and fresh beef. They disclose that we annually derive an immense revenue from these various sources, and convey intelligence of the enormous value of our home productions. When it is considered, furthermore, that in addition to these exports we daily feed over 50,000,000 people, there is nothing more wonderful in the advance of any people in the "wealth of nations."

The aggregated value of property intimately connected with farming and its results sums a grand total which staggers credulity. Investigation astonishes us at the results. Mr. Chairman, upon other products, with the statistics of which I will not weary the patience of this House, we find a corresponding increase. Taken all together, it makes a showing that is calculated to inspire confidence and excite exultation in every American heart and beget a desire that this bill should pass. For instance, we export annually, or did in 1883, the following articles of the value stated:

|---|---|
| Agricultural implements | $3,883,919 |
| Animals, living | 10,833,635 |
| Bread and breadstuffs | 207,853,021 |
| Cotton and cotton manufactures | 258,586,054 |
| Tobacco, and manufactures of | 22,095,229 |
| Wool and carpets, &c | 388,328 |
| Leather, and manufactures of | 8,033,818 |
| Mineral oil | 44,913,079 |

These are given as some of the more important exportations, and do not include many articles. The cotton crop alone, which is principally confined to ten of the Southern States, amounted to 6,957,000 bales in 1882, with an average weight of bales of 474.38 pounds. The acreage in cultivation was 16,276,691 acres, and the value of the crop $309,696,500. In 1883 the acreage was 16,777,993, and the production 6,014,220 bales, of an average weight of 489.95 pounds.

This being the case, in view of the partial array of figures and results, the great importance of the subject, the wealth involved, the millions in interest, why should we further pursue a parsimonious policy toward these diversified branches of our industry? Why throw obstacles in the way? Rather take off the brakes, let on the light, apply the steam, and tender every inducement and encouragement in the way of conciliatory legislation that will conduce to scientific, practical agriculture. Let the Government extend its aid for the enlightenment of our race, the advancement of our national interests, the development of our resources, by a deservedly earned recognition; let improved methods be adopted, experiments tested, and every appliance and facility afforded commensurate with the imperative demands of the great body of our population.

Conventions of farmers are being held in every section, and they earnestly request necessary legislation and proper recognition, at least in proportion to the amount they contribute to the support of the Government and its wealth and greatness.

We should emulate the suggestions of the great Webster and "strive to attain an enlightened agriculture." He characterized it as "the basis of all national wealth." It has been and is approved by the most accomplished political economists of the world. The duty of Congress is to heed this growing request and to encourage our people to still grander achievements. Let it infuse a spirit of confidence that their chosen representatives will reflect their wishes when honestly ascertained. Are we not their servants? Should we not fearlessly represent them and insist upon the enactment of all laws conducive to the public weal? Thus we best promote their interest and the happiness of all our people. Agriculture is of primary importance, and as the Republic progresses and increases in population so does agriculture progress, and its successful development accelerates the power and growth of the country.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I repeat, everything legitimate and constitutional should be accomplished that will tend to the enhancement of agriculture, manufactures, and internal commerce, and in doing so we but advance to, and attain that exalted destiny awaiting us in the future history of mankind. The costs attending the carrying into effect the provisions of this bill are insignificant. They can not be objected to by the most chronic economists. Its failure to pass will demonstrate a want of true, genuine economy and exhibit a want of exalted statesmanship.

The existing arrangement of the bureau, which by its chief and subordinates has proven its efficiency under present circumstances and paucity of allowances, comprises almost a sufficiency of officers, who are salaried, to perform the routine duties, could be retained in the department if it were enlarged, and with but a small outlay of additional expense the proposed legislation would be a success.

In addition to the duties at present incumbent and sought to be attached to this department, the secretary should be required to keep thoroughly posted as to the production, acreage, yield, and the market value of all articles and commodities of agricultural production and domestic commerce, with the necessary costs, including transportation, and to inform the country in regard to the same.

His duties should be enlarged and made to include several of those connected with the Treasury and Interior Departments, such as Commissioner of Railroads, geological surveys, Light-House Board, the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and others I shall not now enumerate. They are in no wise akin to the finances of the Government, but in their apparently neglected condition, are simply orphans under the wardship of these several bureaus.

I would, Mr. Chairman, remove every clog that retards progress, and concentrate agriculture, manufactures, internal commerce, animal industries, and every interest connected with them in one general department, with the hope that its national importance would be justified. Let it be fully equipped for all practical purposes and scientific experiments. The value of the statistician to the agriculturists can not be estimated.

Instead of instrumental agencies being applied in elevating agriculture and increasing its productions, under the policy of our laws and the effect of legislation, this interest of primary importance has been relegated to the rear and in a measure loaded down. Its degradation is attempted by neglect, while it should be honored and dignified by appropriate legislative enactments. What presents a more inviting field to the young and buoyant just entering man's estate than that of a farm, the raising of the different crops, the waving wheat, luxuriant corn, the meadow and the clover-fields, the fleecy staple as it hangs from the cotton-boll, fruits, flowers, and the raising of fine stock? There is so much of independence surrounding such a life, supplemented with comfort and an appreciable absence of the vexations attending other business avocations.

With the coming and going of the propitious seasons he plants and sows, reaps and gathers his crops. His fertile fields, well cultivated with improved implements, yields a golden harvest; his stock increases; he has a surplus over the requirements of necessity which is marketable. His is an honest calling; he sleeps soundly, knowing that his abundance has been acquired by honest exertion, and not at the sacrifice of another's interest, and that with the strength and intellect God has given him he can succeed. This independence, this comfortable, happy life, should be encouraged; but instead of ennobling this pursuit, legislation has burdened it with a tax of 40 per cent. of all the products raised, by unjust discriminations against them, thus deterring men from these pursuits, and hence the professions, manufactures, and trades draw largely from the genius and ability of our people, because these hold out inducements for a greater revenue.

The failure of the Government to regulate transportation as between the States, leaves the farmers in the shipment and marketing of their products at the mercy and conscience of railroad corporations that have fattened and grown rich from the sweat of the faces of the laboring millions. These mammoth monopolies that are enslaving the people and demanding tribute to their increasing potency, have amassed their opulence from the labor, skill, and industry of the farmers. They are an organized body who extort from him a large per cent. of his earnings. With the fund so wrung from enterprising labor they procure their emissaries, agents, and attorneys to infest the State and national capital as lobbyists, to shape and control legislation in their interest, and to the great detriment of the industries of the country.

Thus the chains are forged and braided still closer, and they thrive upon the unconscionable exactions made in their exorbitant tariff of charges. They clamor for more stringent laws.

It is, therefore, Mr. Chairman, high time to organize the agricultural interests as against the tyranny and exactions of capital that has heretofore secured such discriminations against them.

I have had the pleasure recently of reading the eloquent, admirable, and statesmanlike address of Senator VANCE, of North Carolina, to the convention of the National Agricultural Association on "The farmer and politics," in which he truthfully states that "every interest in America comes to Washington to influence legislation except the agricultural. The 'business interests' are as regularly and conspicuously on hand as the representatives of foreign nations, and forty times more importunate."

He further truthfully asserts that it is a fact worth noting that "of all the colossal fortunes owned by so many American citizens not one has been made by agriculture. All have come by some of the other pursuits. Many thousands of them are made yearly by handling the farmer's products, but not one by the farmer himself. Every man who touches his productions makes more clear profit thereby than did he in coaxing them from the earth."

Is it any wonder, Mr. Chairman, that agriculturists are awake to their interest and protesting against a further continuance of this extraordinary course pursued, whereby, as Senator VANCE alleges, "one country merchant absorbs the profits of a hundred farmers, one in a great city will absorb the clear earnings of a thousand; one railroad line will consume the net proceeds of a province?"

Under the laxity of our penal code and elasticity of statutory provisions, in the ordinary course of trade "corners" are organized, capital concentrated, "bucket shops" and legalized corporations are established in the great centers of trade, and these preside in judgment upon the prices of all commodities and "bull and bear" the market as their interests dictate as to prices, which robs the agriculturists often of the value of his products, to the manifest detriment of labor.

These corporations control and fix prices. They regulate the same, not by the natural law of supply and demand, but by the power and potency of organized money, which thrives upon the losses and at the expense and misfortune of the labor and industry of others.

Salutary laws should be enacted to prohibit and bridle such power and its reprehensible abuse. Buyer and seller should be brought closer upon a common level, without intervening hinderances as to fair and remunerative prices. Labor should not be shackled in the ordinary channels of trade. We find that as soon as the rich products of the soil, the hard-earned fruits of honest exertion, pass from the control of the farmer and are clutched in the grasp of concentrated capital, prices temporarily fluctuate and finally advance, and a margin is the result. Princely fortunes are thus made by greedy speculators who had no agency in the production of the commodity, while labor invariably loses. Indeed, capital makes more clear profits out of the agricultural products than does the producer. If legislation tolerates longer these abuses and they go on unrestrained and unbridled, and Congress disregards the rights and warnings of the people, these corporations will soon have complete mastery of our agricultural, manufacturing, and other material interests.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, this I insist is a forcible argument for the passage of this bill, to prevent the abuse of privileges. We should call a halt before these monopolists and magnates assume supreme control and own the property of the country, and the people so materially reduced. Provide for a secretary who will watch with jealous solicitude the wants of this department, and who will recommend needed legislation to circumvent the evils complained of, and by advisory means, if no other, aid in protecting the agricultural, manufacturing, mining, and commercial interests of the States.

Before concluding, Mr. Chairman, I ask the indulgence of the House, and hope in charity I shall be pardoned if State pride induces me to refer particularly to my own native and beloved State of Tennessee, and the interest her people have in the passage of this measure. She is interested in the progress which she herself has made and is making, and her present status and relation as to agricultural pursuits and products in the sisterhood of States. During the late civil conflict her soil was pressed by the martial tread of hostile armies. It was reddened by the blood of her own and the sons of other States. Great battles were fought within her borders and millions of property destroyed and emancipated. Her farms were neglected and dilapidated, furnaces idle and shops closed. Towns and cities were burned and almost annihilated; stock killed or driven away, the character of labor changed, and general bankruptcy and threatened ruin stared her brave people in the face. A gloomy pall brooded o'er her destiny. The energies of her people were temporarily paralyzed. With bowed heads and saddened hearts they mourned the loss of their slain sons, comrades, and friends, as they beheld the shattered remnants of prosperity, and looked upon their houseless chimneys and the charred ruins of once happy and comfortable homes, as they stood the stern and bleak sentinels of uncivilized war. But her population was composed of brave men and noble women, and with a new resolution and heroic determination they looked not behind them to brood in memory over the disconsolations and defeats of the past. They could not be subdued by former discomfitures and irreparable losses. They went forward in the march of progress to the attainment of their former prosperity.

To-day, sir, Tennessee stands unparalleled, and history fails to record an instance where a people have recovered from financial embarrassment more rapidly. Homes have been rebuilt, houses remodeled and beautified, and farms, reclaimed and refenced, are now yielding abundant crops. Evidences of improvement are seen in every direction. The skill, energy, and industry of her people have accomplished much; and, with a commendable reverence for the motto, "Agriculture and Commerce," engraven upon her great seal, her population of 1,542,359 souls have devoted themselves to agriculture, and their efforts and investments have been rewarded. To-day we find the Volunteer State, God bless her! standing in the line of agricultural achievements among the first States of the Federal Union. She owes this to the indomitable energy of her people, to a generous, productive soil, and a genial climate, adapted to the cultivation and growth of a diversity of products.

From the recently published census reports we find that Tennessee yields annually the following:

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Indian corn | bushels | 62,764,429 |
| Wheat | bushels | 7,341,353 |
| Oats | bushels | 4,722,190 |
| Rye | bushels | 156,419 |
| Buckwheat | bushels | 33,434 |
| Cotton | bales | 330,644 |
| Tobacco (of the value of $1,538,757) | pounds | 29,365,052 |

Her farm animals consist of—

| | Number. | Value. |
|---|---|---|
| Horses | 272,764 | $19,569,913 |
| Mules | 178,191 | 13,825,840 |
| Milch cows | 313,742 | 7,379,212 |
| Oxen and other cattle | 466,084 | 7,802,246 |
| Sheep | 655,214 | 1,172,833 |
| Hogs | 2,127,966 | 8,863,618 |

The area of the farms cultivated in Tennessee is 20,666,915 acres, of the value of $206,749,837. Add to the foregoing summary her interest invested in other live-stock and the income from other productions, fruits, and vegetables, incident to her varied farming, and an array of facts are presented which are truly astonishing.

Tennesseeans are anxious and eager for a thorough organization of their farmers into associations. They assemble and dispassionately discuss scientific agriculture, the improved methods, the adaptability of her soil to different products, and the necessary reformation in the system, machinery, and implements in the cultivation of the various crops.

A commendable zeal is manifested by her chief executive and commissioner in giving all the aid in their power, and their efforts have been attended with signal success. The raising of stock is encouraged, and our annual fairs are an evidence of the triumph in this interest.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, in behalf of the great agricultural interests of my State, I shall vote for this bill with a consciousness that I am in accord with the desires of my fellow-citizens, and because I think it eminently right.

I hope to see the day, not far distant, when extravagant expenditures will be cut down, appropriations reduced to an economic standard, and an amount sufficient, which is economy, devoted to the promotion of the industrial pursuits of the land. While this class of our fellow-citizens pay largely over one-half the expenses of the Government, State and national, the amount heretofore appropriated the Department has been quite too small to meet its great and urgent demands.

Legislative aid has been invoked and exorbitant sums expended, special privileges granted to nearly every business interest but that of agriculture. Lands have been granted by the millions of acres in the construction of railways, public thoroughfares, and improvements, and they have had the fostering hand of the Government extended them and the gracious benefit of legislation.

Public and private corporations, banks, and all kinds of colossal monopolies have had indulgences, and many questionable and disreputable jobs have passed Congress under the guiding hand of their money-eyed friends and lobbyists, while the all-important agricultural interests have hitherto failed to receive the recognition it demands. We have a plethoric treasury with millions of surplus, and can afford the appropriation of a sufficiency to successfully carry on this department.

I rejoice, Mr. Chairman, to see the agriculturists uniting. Their number is large, influence great, and aggregated wealth vast. It will be potent, as they demonstrate that they can and will play a pre-eminent part in the political arena. I thank the House for the indulgence so generously extended me.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few suggestions concerning some of the features of this bill.

It will be noticed that under the division of "agricultural statistics" it is proposed to appropriate about $134,000. I have every reason to suppose that the work of gathering these statistics is carefully done, and I know personally that the results of the work are eagerly sought by the farmers. Every day's mail furnishes me ample evidence of that fact. I only wish that I could supply a quarter of the demand which exists in my large and populous district for the books and the seeds furnished by the Department of Agriculture.

The suggestions which I have to make will be in the line of making this appropriation of the greatest use to the greatest number. We do not pay out this large sum of money simply that the Commissioner and his corps of assistants may gather up facts and figures and experience for future use. We pay it out to obtain the best fruits of their labors in order that the entire community may also enjoy their benefits. In the past the annual reports on agriculture have been principally the means of bringing the labors of the department to public attention. Those reports no doubt serve a good purpose, and should probably be continued; but they reach only a small proportion of those who would gladly obtain them.

I wish to call attention to these smaller monthly reports, one of which I now hold in my hand. They have never been widely distributed and their usefulness is not so generally known.

During the past year I have taken occasion to examine them, and I know that they treat of subjects which are of vital importance to every farmer in this country. They are filled with useful facts concerning the best methods of cultivating and producing various crops—concerning the acreage of crops at the East and at the West. One I notice is a report upon the numbers and values of farm animals. Others relate to the success or failure of different crops in different sections in this country and in Europe. Under the provisions of law each one contains a statement of the freight rates upon different railroads. Every one of these little cheap reports contains information which would be welcomed in the home of every reading, intelligent farmer who speaks the English language. My suggestion is that these little reports, which if printed in large quantities would cost only a few cents each, should be so generally circulated as to thoroughly disseminate whatever the Department of Agriculture may gather that is worth knowing. In this way the public will have the benefit of the $134,000 appropriated for their good.

It is true, sir, I have noticed in some of these reports that the Commissioner mixes heresy with his facts. The Commissioner would perhaps be more than mortal if he should entirely forget politics and the beauties of a protective tariff. But I am willing to leave it to the hard sense of the farmers to settle their own theories. I would like to have them given the facts and figures which these reports contain, and they can separate the chaff from the wheat. Now, there is only one objection which can be urged to the generous printing and circulation of these reports, and that is the matter of expense. I examined last evening the last report of the Public Printer to ascertain what information I could give the House upon that subject. There is no reference to these reports, but I did find reference to other matters in which I became interested, and which will be of interest to the gentlemen of this House. That report convinces me that either we are amply able to print and circulate very widely these little pamphlets and other inexpensive documents, or else that our system of public printing is wasteful and prodigal in the extreme.

And in passing allow me to say that in my judgment if this same report of the Public Printer were to be placed in the hands of every one of our constituents there would be an overhauling of this business of public printing very soon after the next election.

Let me call attention to a few of the more conspicuous of these expenditures.

The printing of the second annual report of the director of the Bureau of Ethnology costs $34,500. The third annual report costs the same. From page 28 of the report of the Public Printer it will be seen that the printing of the works just referred to, together with that of other works on ethnology, is estimated to cost the little sum of $140,600.

How deeply our constituents are interested in this subject of ethnology I have not had time to ascertain, nor do I know how many of them have ever had the honor of seeing or admiring these expensive volumes for which they have all contributed to pay.

Again, the printing of the final report of the Geological Survey, volume 3, cost $44,235. Of this there were 6,100 copies, costing more than $7 per copy. It seems that the expense of printing the Geological Surveys enumerated in this report of the Public Printer amounts to about $110,000. I regard this expenditure as less open to criticism than any which I shall refer to, and yet I very much doubt whether the public generally will believe it necessary to expend so great a sum in this direction. It has cost also about $40,000 to print the History and the Geology of the Comstock Lode. Whether these publications were more valuable as contributions to science or as an advertisement of the Comstock lode I am unable to say. The printing of one of them cost more than $7 per copy; and if those copies have been distributed it has been about in the ratio of one to each 11,000 of our people.

A little farther on in the report appears a statement of the cost of printing Hayden's twelfth annual report. Of this there were 11,900 copies, which cost $103,802, or more than $8 per copy. It ought to be a valuable work. The Public Prinfer tells us that the engraving and lithographing alone cost $63,470. Perhaps one citizen in each 5,000 is its favored possessor. But it must not be forgotten that every tax-payer who follows the plow, or who is a wage-worker in the shop or the manufactory for his daily bread, pays his share of this expense.

I doubt, sir, if it is quite consonant with the spirit of our institutions to expend these large sums of money in this manner. I am confident that whatever may be valuable in these publications might have been preserved, and might have been far more widely disseminated than it has, by an expenditure of one-quarter of the money which they have cost. If some one had the time and inclination it might be an interesting pursuit to trace out the history of these rare volumes, to see where they go and whose property they become. But this is a subject over which the tax-payer can meditate to his heart's content.

There may be some defense for a part of the expenditures to which I have alluded. But I now come to another class of publications for which I assert there is no justification whatever. I find there is reported an expenditure of about $40,000 for the printing of eulogies in honor of deceased Senators and Members of the Forty-seventh Congress. This is a custom which should either be abandoned or extended. If it is a wise and judicious expenditure of the public moneys, it should not be confined alone to those whose associates have the power of appropriating public money. If the practice is to exist at all, there is every reason that these eulogies should also extend to those not members of Congress who have been distinguished in public life. A little more than a year ago a distinguished citizen of Wisconsin and of this Republic passed away. He had been for nearly twenty years a Senator of the United States. He had rendered his country eminent service abroad. At the time of his death he was a Cabinet officer I have not heard that Congress caused eulogies to be printed in his honor at public expense. He needed no such eulogies. His long, eminent, and unsullied public career was eulogy enough. The same may be said of every distiguished man, whether in public or in private life.

It may be gratifying to members of Congress to pay this tribute to the memory of their associates. But that is not the only consideration. If the public moneys were our own we could use them in a thousand ways in paying graceful tributes to thousands of worthy men.

I am satisfied that the public would not if they fully understood it approve the expenditure which this custom now involves.

I might allude to other expenditures in the public printing which if generally known would, I have no doubt, attract attention. Perhaps some of the other items are even more open to criticism than those which have been mentioned.

What I have said is in no partisan spirit and with no intention to do injustice to any man; therefore it should perhaps be said that the Public Printer is not responsible for the incurring of these expenditures. The last Congress was responsible. We of this Congress will also be responsible if we continue them.

Nor have I called attention to these abuses—for I believe them to be abuses—with any intention of discouraging the printing of such documents as are required by a proper regard for the public good. The Government properly has its bureaus of statistics. Citizens willingly pay their money to support them. Nor would they begrudge the money which should be expended in printing and giving these statistics wide and generous circulation.

The money expended in printing one of the books to which I have referred would have printed millions of these little pamphlets which contain information that every intelligent farmer would be eager to obtain. There are sent to each member of Congress four or five of these little reports each month for distribution; the past month I received five. This would be perhaps one for each 30,000 of my constituents. In my judgment $200,000 of these expenditures reported by the Public Printer were unnecessary. That sum of money could have been expended in printing less expensive documents, which could have been generally distributed among all classes of people, rich and poor alike. I have referred more particularly to agricultural reports because this bill in part relates to those. But what has been said concerning these is equally true of other publications which are and might be printed by the Government. The consular reports are filled with facts concerning the industries and progress of other nations which would be gladly welcomed in almost every American home.

It must be borne in mind, too, that the massive volumes of census reports which are being prepared and published at great expense are not accessible to the masses. There could be printed statistical abstracts of these reports at comparatively small expense, abstracts which would contain the pith and substance of the larger reports, and which might take to the homes of the common people the information which their money has helped to collect. Those who have always enjoyed the advantages of the great city libraries can have but little conception of the satisfaction which such books as I have mentioned would give to those whose lives are spent in their country homes. Half of my life has been spent upon a farm. I know that as a rule books which have merit and which go to a farmer's home are appreciated, and they bear their fruit.

My complaint is that the Government should appropriate toward this printing fund such magnificent sums for a favored few and such a pittance for the masses.

I would gladly see some of the money which has heretofore been dedicated to extravagance in public printing devoted to other purposes. We have many thousands of constituents who would gladly receive such documents as we could print and send without extravagance. They would not demand elegant bindings; they would not expect those magnificent engravings for which they have had to pay, but on which they have never gazed.

These plain, inexpensive, but useful publications would bring to the farmer's home information which would place him more nearly on a level with those of whom he buys and to whom he sells. They would dignify and sweeten the laborer's toil. They would give the honest ambition of his boys and girls something on which to feed.

I ask not greater expenditures, but expenditures so directed as to instruct and please an infinitely greater number of men and women. The changes which I suggest may not come in a day, but I am confident that the present system can not be of long duration.

Mr. DIBRELL. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CULLEN], a member of the committee reporting this bill.

Mr. CULLEN. I have no intention of consuming the time of the Committee of the Whole in making a general speech on either politics, the tariff, or any other subject not connected with this agricultural appropriation bill. I do not propose to take any notice of the criticisms of the gentleman who has just taken his seat in regard to the extravagance and waste of money in the publication of the results of scientific research in the various departments of this great Government. I apprehend that no exception will be taken to the publications of the Agricultural Department on the ground that they do not furnish practical information to the people most interested in that great industry.

I rose only to say that having in committee gone through this bill and carefully considered all the items contained therein, I am satisfied in my own mind that it is a fair bill; that there are no extravagant items in it, and that there is nothing in it but what is necessary and proper in order to continue the work of that Department for the benefit and advantage of the people. There are some items of appropriation in this bill which are less in amount than the estimates called for; there are some items that may perhaps be considered as too low. That, however, is only a question as to whether this Congress desires to greatly enlarge the labors of the Department or to keep it practically as it has been heretofore. There are some items in this bill which this Committee of the Whole may see proper to increase. I refer more particularly to that item of appropriation for the purchase and distribution of seeds, &c. The Committee on Agriculture thought it best to leave that item as it has been heretofore, at $75,000, notwithstanding the increased membership of this House. The committee, however, are willing, if it shall be thought proper, that that item of appropriation shall be increased to $100,000, the amount estimated for by the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Believing, then, that the bill is a fair one, that it will answer all the purposes and all the demands of the Agricultural Department, that the appropriations contained in it are not so small in any respect as to cripple the efficiency of that Department, and believing also that if any amendments shall be proposed they may be fairly and properly considered and the provisions of the bill explained under the five-minute rule, I will not now take up any more time, but will yield to the gentleman in charge of the bill [Mr. DIBRELL] for any motion which he may think proper to submit.

Mr. DIBRELL. I now ask consent that the Committee of the Whole proceed to the consideration of this bill by paragraphs under the five-minute rule.

There was no objection.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill, and read the following:

Entomological division:

For compensation of entomologist, $2,500; one assistant entomologist, $1,400; for assistants in entomological division, when necessary, $4,000; for investigating the history and habits of insects injurious to agriculture and horticulture, experiments in ascertaining the best means of destroying them, for drawings, and for chemicals and traveling and other expenses on the practical work of the entomological division, $20,000; in all, $27,900: Provided, That the amount expended for traveling expenses shall not exceed $3 per day, inclusive of transportation.

Mr. DIBRELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Agriculture to move to amend the proviso in the paragraph last read so that it will read as follows:

Provided, That the amount expended for such assistants, when making investigations, shall not exceed $3 per day, exclusive of transportation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

Seed division:

For compensation of chief of seed division, $1,800; one superintendent of seed-room, $1,200; four clerks, at $1,000 each, $4,000; one clerk, at $840; for the purchase and propagation, and distribution, as required by law, of seeds, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, and expenses of putting up the same, to be distributed in localities adapted to their culture, $75,000. An equal proportion of two-thirds of all plants, seeds, cuttings, vines, and shrubs shall, upon their request, be supplied to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress for distribution among their constituents, or shall, by their direction, be sent to their constituents: Provided, That all seeds, plants, and cuttings herein allotted to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress for distribution remaining uncalled for at the end of the fiscal year shall be distributed by the Commissioner of Agriculture: And provided also, That the Commissioner shall report, as provided in this act, the place, quantity, and price of seeds purchased, from whom purchased, and the date of purchase. But nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to prevent the Commissioner of Agriculture from sending flower, garden, and other seeds to those who apply for the same. And the amount herein appropriated shall not be diverted or used for any other purpose but for the purchase, propagation, and distribution of improved vegetable seeds, plants, cuttings, and vines: But provided, however, That the Commissioner shall not distribute to any Senator, Representative, or Delegate seeds entirely unfit for the climate and locality he represents, but shall distribute the same so that each member may have seeds of equal value, as near as may be, and the best adapted to the locality he represents; in all, $82,840.

Mr. VANCE. I move to amend the paragraph just read so as to increase the amount for the purchase, propagation, and distribution of seeds, &c., from $75,000 to $100,000. I think the amount here proposed for seeds and cuttings, $75,000, is not sufficient.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I will state, for the information of the committee and of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] submitting the amendment, that the sum named in this bill for this purpose, $75,000, is the same in amount as that which has been appropriated from year to year for the past three or four years. There was a difference of opinion in the Committee on Agriculture as to whether or not the amount should be increased in consideration of the increased membership of the House and of the area of territory over which these seeds are to be distributed. It was agreed by the committee that if a motion was made in Committee of the Whole to increase this sum they would not raise the point of order upon it, but permit the question to be determined by the Committee of the Whole.

I will say further, for the information of members, that I have been informed by the chief clerk of the Agricultural Department, who has charge of this seed division, that $100,000 worth of seeds can be distributed for about the same cost that is required to distribute $75,000 worth; in other words, that the machinery of the Department as now arranged, with perhaps a very small increase, will enable them to distribute $100,000 worth of seeds at about the same expense that it now costs them to distribute $75,000 worth. I hope we may have a vote promptly on the amendment.

Mr. DIBRELL. I will state that the subcommittee preparing this bill inserted the amount asked for by the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. VANCE. How much was that?

Mr. DIBRELL. Seventy-five thousand dollars. As there seems to be a disposition to increase the amount, I will not object.

Mr. VANCE. I do not wish to occupy the time of the committee unnecessarily. I really think that $100,000 for seeds is a very small amount for the purpose, and I hope that the friends of the bill on both sides of the House will give us that amount.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. VANCE; and upon a division there were—ayes 88, noes 13.

So (no further count being called for) the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. DIBRELL. I ask unanimous consent to go back to line 127, on page 6, for the purpose of making an amendment to increase the aggregate appropriation in that paragraph, which relates to "seed division," from $82,840 to $107,840. This increase is necessary by reason of the amendment making an increase of $25,000 in the amount appropriated for the purchase and distribution of seeds.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection that amendment will be made.

There being no objection, the bill was amended accordingly.

Mr. DIBRELL. I move that the committee now rise and report the bill to the House, with the amendments.

Mr. PETERS. I wish to offer an amendment to come in at the close of line 184.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. We have passed that.

Mr. DIBRELL. I make a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. PETERS. Then I will offer the amendment to come in at the close of the bill, though it would probably come in more properly at the end of the first section.

Mr. DIBRELL. I make the point of order that the bill has been completed and a motion made that the committee rise.

Mr. PETERS. I rose and obtained, I believe, the recognition of the Chair before that motion was made.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] proposes to offer an amendment to a paragraph that has been passed. Under the rules that amendment is not in order. I make the point of order against it.

Mr. PETERS. I will offer the amendment to come in at the end of the bill.

Mr. DIBRELL. Then it is not germane.

A MEMBER. How do you know that till the amendment has been read?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment sent to the desk by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

"Reclamation of arid and waste lands:

"SEC. 3. For locating and sinking artesian wells, with a view to reclaiming arid and waste public lands, in the State of Kansas, $10,000; to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That no part of this sum shall be expended in experiments upon the lands of individuals or corporations, but only upon the lands belonging to the United States."

Mr. PETERS. I offer that, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I make a point of order that this amendment is new legislation and increases expenditures.

Mr. PETERS. I hope the gentleman will reserve his point of order long enough to allow me to make a statement.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I have no objection to permitting the gentleman to make a statement for a minute or two.

Mr. CULLEN. I desire to give notice that if the amendment be entertained, I propose to move to amend it by striking out "Kansas" and inserting "Colorado." That is where they are working now.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. AIKEN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to know whether upon a bill making appropriations for the Agricultural Department it is legitimate to introduce a provision requiring an appropriation of money to be expended by the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. PETERS. The Secretary of the Interior, I believe, has charge of the Bureau of Agriculture.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. No, sir; he has nothing to do with it. I insist on my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. PETERS. I wish to state this——

Mr. DIBRELL. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BOYLE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5261) making appropriations for the Agricultural Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, and with a recommendation that the bill be passed as amended.

Mr. DIBRELL. I move the previous question upon agreeing to the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole House, and upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. PERKINS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. After the previous question is ordered, can a motion be entertained to amend one of these sections or paragraphs?

The SPEAKER. The previous question, if ordered, will cut off all amendments and all debate.

Mr. PERKINS. Is it in order to make the motion now?

The SPEAKER. It is not, pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. PERKINS. I would like to suggest the character of my amendment, so that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DIBRELL] may determine whether he will insist upon the previous question.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. Let the amendment be read by the Clerk.

Mr. PERKINS. The amendment I wish to offer is to strike out $25,000 as the amount of the appropriation for investigating infectious and contagious diseases of domestic animals, and to insert "$50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. DIBRELL. I do not consent to that amendment. I insist upon the previous question.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. The House has already passed a bill on that subject; and if it passes the Senate, the gentleman's amendment will not be necessary.

Mr. PERKINS. I agree with the gentleman; but I am afraid it will not pass the Senate.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. DIBRELL. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. This being a general appropriation bill, I suppose the yeas and nays must be taken upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill pass? On this question, under the rules of the House, the yeas and nays must be taken.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 211, nays 0, not voting 111; as follows:

YEAS—211.

ISSUE OF CLOTHING, COMPANY K, FIRST UNITED STATES INFANTRY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the proceedings of a board of survey convened at Whipple Barracks, Arizona, recommending the passage by Congress of a bill authorizing the issue of clothing to enlisted men of Company K, First United States Infantry, in lieu of clothing destroyed by fire; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

FORFEITURE OF A LAND GRANT IN OREGON.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a privileged motion. I move to take from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. 181) to declare forfeited certain lands granted to aid in the construction of a railroad in Oregon, and to enforce the same by judicial proceedings, reported from the Committee on the Public Lands, and put the same upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read. It is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all lands granted by chapter 69, page 94, 16 Statutes at Large, approved May 4, A. D. 1870, entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Portland to Astoria and McMinnville, in the State of Oregon," and all rights, titles, and privileges as to any of the public lands granted or conferred by, through, or under said act, be, and they are hereby, declared forfeited and determined; that all of said lands be restored to the public domain and made subject to sale and settlement under existing laws of the United States [and the Attorney-General is hereby instructed to enforce the provisions hereof by proper judicial proceedings]. In case any of the lands embraced within the terms of this act, to which the said railroad company or its successor would have been entitled had the said road been constructed as provided in the act making the grant, have been sold by either of said companies prior to January 1, 1884, the party or person so purchasing any of said lands shall have the right to the lands so purchased upon making proof of the fact of such purchase at the local land office of the district where said land may be located: Provided, That all unpaid purchase-money on such sales shall be paid to the United States, through the receiver of public moneys at the proper land office; and upon proof as above, and payment of such unpaid balance, if any, within twelve months of the passage of this act, patents shall issue to the parties entitled thereto for the land.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to declare forfeiture of certain lands granted to aid in the construction of a railroad in Oregon."

The SPEAKER. The question is upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. GEORGE. I would like to be heard upon this question.

Mr. PAYSON. I desire that the report may be read in connection with the bill, which will be the argument upon which I shall ask the passage of the bill.

The report was read, as follows:

Mr. PAYSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, submitted the following report (to accompany bill H. R. 181):

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred bill H. R. 181, having had the same under consideration, submit the following report:

By the act of Congress approved May 4, 1870 (16 Statutes at Large, chap. 69), a grant of the public lands was made to aid the Oregon Central Railroad Company in constructing a railroad and telegraph line "from Portland to Astoria, and from a suitable point of junction near Forest Grove to the Yamhill River, near McMinnville, in the State of Oregon."

The grant was of the usual right of way, necessary lands for depots, sidetracks, &c., and also the alternate sections, designated by odd numbers, nearest said road, to the amount of ten sections per mile on each side of the road; the act also made the usual provision for indemnity in case of prior sale or other disposition by the Government of the odd sections which otherwise would have passed to the company.

Section 3 provides that whenever sections of twenty or more consecutive miles of the road and telegraph line should be completed the Secretary of the Interior should cause the same to be examined, and if properly constructed and equipped he should cause patents to issue to the company for so much of the granted lands as should be adjacent to and conterminous with the completed sections.

Section 5 provides that the company should, by mortgage or deed of trust, appropriate and set apart all the net proceeds of the granted lands as a sinking fund for the payment of the first-mortgage construction bonds of the company authorized by the act to be issued.

Section 6 is as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That the said company shall file with the Secretary of the Interior its assent to this act within one year from the time of its passage; and the foregoing grant is upon condition that said company shall complete a section of twenty or more miles of said railroad and telegraph within two years, and the entire railroad and telegraph within six years, from said date."

Portland is distant from Astoria, inland, 117 miles. From Forest Grove to the Yamhill River near McMinnville is 27½ miles, making the whole length of the road and its branch 144½ miles.

Before the expiration of the six years named in the act making the grant the company constructed a line of road from Portland westwardly toward Forest Grove about 25 miles, and thence southwardly to the Yamhill River near McMinnville about 27½ miles, in all 47½ miles of constructed road practically on the line of the road proposed in the grant.

The road as constructed, however, did not end at the Yamhill River, but its construction was continued to the south, up the Willamette Valley to Corvallis, and its construction still being proposed to be continued southwardly to the Oregon State line, to meet the system of railroads being built northward in California to the State line by the Central Pacific Railroad Company.

This line of railroad being considered is now owned by the Oregon and California Railroad Company, which last company has absorbed the Oregon Central, and succeeded to all its property rights and franchises in 1881, and all operated by the Oregon and Transcontinental Company under practically a perpetual lease.

We quote from the brief of the counsel as to this succession by the California and Oregon Railroad Company to the rights of the Oregon Central:

"The great purpose of the reorganization uniting the property and interests of the two organizations for the purpose of having a better basis of credit was to secure as speedy as possible the completion of the uncompleted portions of both roads, to wit, from Roseburg south to a connection with the Central Pacific, which, on account of its greater importance to all the people and the Government, was to be first completed, if work on all could not progress at the same time, or in case funds to carry on both at the same time could not be raised, and then the line to Astoria."

To understand this fully it should be stated that the Oregon and California Company is claimed to be the successor of another Oregon Central Railroad Company which was organized in Oregon to receive a grant of public lands made by act of Congress, July 25, A. D. 1866 (14 Stats., p. 239), which grant was made to aid in the construction of a line of railroad from Portland south to the Oregon State line, to meet there a line of railroad being built northwardly by the Central Pacific Company, the two lines, the one in California and the one in Oregon, when united, to form a through line from Portland to San Francisco. In 1880 the Oregon and California Company had its line constructed south to Roseburg, in Oregon, and the Central Pacific had its line built northward, in California, to Redding.

Mr. Henry Villard had at this time secured control of all the lines of railroad transportation in Oregon except the Oregon Central, the road being considered here, and in 1881 secured this and consolidated it with the Oregon and California Railroad, and, as stated by the attorney for that corporation in the quotation from his brief above, to use the credit of the Oregon Central, added to that of the Oregon and California, to build first the railroads to the Oregon State line—two roads where only one was intended by Congressional aid—and to defer, at least, and as we shall show presently, eventually abandon, the building of the road for which this grant was made.

That part of the projected road for which this grant was made, namely, from near Forest Grove to Astoria, a distance of ninety-seven miles, has not only not been completed, but no work has ever been done upon it.

The lands embraced within the limits of the grant, estimated for the main line at 1,120,880 acres, have been for all these years withdrawn from sale and settlement and still remain so.

No lands whatever have ever been patented to the company, although it should be stated that the forty-seven and one-half miles constructed have been inspected under authority of the Interior Department and pronounced as properly constructed.

An examination of the debates in Congress at the time this grant was made will show what, indeed, would be plainly apparent by a glance at the map, that the main factor in the case was railroad and telegraphic communication between the well-settled section about, even then, the important city of Portland and Astoria. The condition and situation is well stated in the brief of the attorney for the company here, and we insert it:

"The line of road in aid of the construction of which this grant was made, though short, is one of vital interest to the people of Oregon, especially those of Northern Oregon; and it is only by the completion of the ninety-seven miles of uncompleted road that the vast interests—commercial, military, and otherwise—now rapidly developing at Astoria, near the mouth of the Columbia, can be brought into communication by rail with the great transcontinental road.

"Astoria, the mouth of the Columbia, the military forts of Stevens and Canby, hedged in as they are on the Washington Territory side by almost impassable ranges of mountains, find their only hope of obtaining rail connection with the transcontinental lines in the completion of this road; and it was this anomalous condition of affairs, in connection with the great cost of the construction of this road, and the commercial and military necessities of the case, that led Congress in 1870 to regard the building of this short line as a national undertaking, and hence this grant in aid of its construction."

It will be remembered that about the time Mr. Villard secured control of this road and merged it in the Oregon and California, thus securing control of all the routes of railroad transportation in Oregon, he also secured control of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, and thus had in control the entire railroad transportation system of Oregon, Washington, and the extreme Northwest.

Confessedly, by the company's attorneys, the immense load of construction thus being carried—

"The expensive character of the work on the remaining ninety-seven miles to Astoria, and other reasons of a financial character, the company, notwithstanding this grant, was unable to secure funds with which to complete this Astoria section, and at the same time push the construction of its road southerly to a connection with the southern transcontinental roads. That portion of the road that is completed was constructed by the Oregon Central Railroad Company, to which the grant was made."

The citizens of Astoria, interested in the construction of the road, who desired the benefit of the munificent grant, in tangible shape, in the construction of the road, instead of being held as an asset, to be used when and as should suit the convenience of the Oregon and Transcontinental Company (which corporation stands as the lessee of all the Oregon and Washington lines, as well as the financial controller of the Northern Pacific, as your committee is advised and believes), have been clamoring for the construction of the road for years, but could get nothing but indefinite promises.

It is in proof before the committee that companies have been ready for organization, and to build the road without a dollar of Government aid or an acre of land, if this company was out of the way.

The Forty-seventh Congress was memorialized by large numbers of the citizens of that part of Oregon to forfeit the grant, so that private capital would be free to embark in the enterprise of building the road without the danger of a competition with this grant to a rival.

But assurance was given by Mr. Villard, in response to an inquiry of a member of that Congress, that "its construction will be commenced during the coming year" (1883).

On this assurance and the claim for equitable delay by the company, the committee of the Forty-seventh Congress delayed action.

During the past vacation the matter was still pressed by the Astoria people, and finally Mr. Villard, on September 13, 1883, wrote the secretary of the Astoria Chamber of Commerce:

"Referring to the conference had with the committee of your chamber of commerce at my office in this city on April 24 last, I am only now able to redeem the promise then made that I would inform your chamber of commerce at the earliest possible moment of the result of the survey of the Astoria-Forest Grove line. So many unforeseen obstacles were encountered in making the surveys that it was a matter of absolute impossibility to complete the work at an earlier date. I regret to say that the estimates of the cost of the line in question now before me are so large that it will be impossible for the Oregon and Transcontinental Company, as lessee of the Oregon and California Railroad Company, to undertake its construction. According to the engineers' figures the cost will be no less than an average of $50,000 per mile in money, not including the probable cost of proper terminal facilities at Astoria, estimated at $750,000. Under the existing mortgage we could not possibly issue more than the nominal amount of $30,000 per mile in bonds on the line, and there are absolutely no means to meet the deficiency at the command of either party. We must therefore abandon the project."

We have before us a memorial passed unanimously by the Astoria Chamber of Commerce November 22, 1883, averring, among other things:

"Memorial to restore to the public domain certain lands granted to the Oregon Central Railroad Company.

"To the honorable the Congress of the United States:

"Your memorialists, the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Astoria, of the State of Oregon, would most respectfully represent:

"That on the 4th day of May, 1870, your honorable bodies passed an act granting to the Oregon Central Railroad Company of Oregon the alternate sections of land to the extent of twenty sections per mile, including the iron and coal therein, to aid in the construction of a railroad from Portland to Astoria, with a branch from a suitable point of junction at or near Forest Grove to McMinnville, in the State of Oregon. Said lands were conditionally granted to said railroad for a distance of twenty miles each side of said railroad, and in case the ten full sections per mile could not be found on each side of said road within the said limit of twenty miles, other lands should be selected within a limit of twenty-five miles on each side to make up such deficiency.

"That said grant was made on the expressed condition that said railroad should be completed in six years from said date, and that said limit expired more than seven years ago.

"That the portion of the railroad most easily constructed between Portland and McMinnville (a distance of about fifty miles) was built within the specified time, but since that time no part of the main line between Forest Grove and Astoria (a distance of about one hundred miles) has been built, nor is it in process of construction.

"That the president of the company now holding the grant has publicly declared his unwillingness to build the road.

* * * * * *

"We would further represent that the lands of this company are rich in timber, iron, and coals; that the cost of the proposed railroad is not excessive, and we firmly believe that the road would have been built many years ago if the grant had been held by parties whose interests were not against the building of the road, and would be built now if the land grant were only declared forfeited.

"That the Oregon Central Railroad, built and to be built, is controlled by transfers and lease to the Oregon and Transcontinental Railroad Company, and the latter company is opposed to any extension of its system to Astoria.

"That the continuance of this grant is acting as a barrier to the settlement and development of the country and its resources; and that it is also acting as a bar to the building of a railroad by any other company through the same section.

"Wherefore, your memorialists would most earnestly but respectfully pray that all the said lands granted the Oregon Central Railroad Company, together with all lands which are overlapped by the Northern Pacific limits, and which are within a limit of twenty-five miles of the Oregon Central Railroad's located route (whether in Washington Territory or in Oregon), and all lands which would have inured to the Oregon Central Railroad in case it had been built, be declared forfeited and thrown open to public settlement under the general land laws of the United States.

"And we further most emphatically protest against any transfer or patents being granted of any of this overlapping grant (or any lands within twenty-five miles of the Oregon Central route) to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, and as in duty bound we shall ever pray.

"Passed the Chamber, November 22, 1883."

Similar memorials, signed by over 2,000 citizens of Oregon, in the vicinity of the line, are also before us, and nobody, except those representing the company's interests, opposes the forfeiture.

In signing the petition for the forfeiture of the grant Mr. Gaston writes as follows:

GASTON, OREG., December 4, 1883.

I was president of the Oregon Central Railroad Company at the time Congress made the grant referred to in the above petition, and presented the matter before committees of the Senate and House of Representatives. And while the lands were then needed to secure the construction of the road, the circumstances of this country have been so changed since that the grant is, in the hands of its present owners, an obstruction to the construction of a railroad to Astoria and the development of the country. For if the grant was forfeited the country would be at once rapidly settled up, and other railroad companies would build a narrow-gauge railroad, if not a more expensive line.

JOSEPH GASTON.

As bearing on the question of the necessity of continuing the grant to insure a road to Astoria, it appears, by the current newspapers from Astoria, that upon the information given to the country that this committee had resolved to recommend forfeiture of this grant, capitalists have already visited Astoria with a view to secure terminal facilities and some local aid, and build the road. The newspaper account of the visit is as follows:

"He came to Astoria to make negotiations concerning the immediate construction of a standard-gauge railroad from here to Forest Grove. From his knowledge of the country to be traversed by the road it must be of standard gauge, thoroughly built throughout, well ballasted, and provided with all the safeguards against washouts, &c. The road, in his judgment, would cost to build from here to Forest Grove about $2,250,000. His proposition was for Astoria to give toward the building of this road the sum of $200,000 and suitable terminal facilities. It is reported on the street that at a meeting at the chamber of commerce rooms, on Saturday afternoon, Colonel Taylor promised thirty-four acres of land and accompanying tide land and water-front at Smith's Point, being worth at a fair valuation $40,000; and that other citizens present had so far expressed themselves concerning the amounts they would give, varying from $1,000 to $5,000, as to leave little doubt but that the $200,000 would be immediately forthcoming.

"Mr. Negus went on to say that the parties for whom he was acting were satisfied as to the financial desirability of the investment, and only looked on the giving of the bonus named and the facilities asked for as a fair expression on the part of our citizens. He said that the proposed road would not be in the interest of, nor would it be owned or controlled by, any existing corporation now on this coast; that he was fully prepared to negotiate, and that could everything prove satisfactory the work of construction would be immediately begun at Astoria and pushed to a speedy completion. In answer to a question as to who the parties were, Mr. Negus declined to say more than that he was one of the principals; that the corporation when organized would be composed of Massachusetts men, and that the moneys required would be raised in London.

"In deference to Mr. Negus's wishes much that was said is not here set down. In response to the query as to his future movements and the probable result of his visit he said that that was as yet undetermined. His visit here has given him a large amount of information concerning the place, its prosperity, and probable future; he was most favorably impressed, and now that he had visited Astoria he was more than ever in favor of building the railroad forthwith, and that the matter of the grant was still to be disposed of. Were the grant out of the way, the fall of 1885 would see Astoria in railroad communication with the remainder of the country. The road that he proposed to build must run through a country covered by the present grant, and while arrangements could and possibly would be made to allow the building of the line, yet nothing but the forfeiture of the grant would insure the best results derivable from the enterprise.

"Right here, as always, the whole matter seems to hinge; while the grant spreads its shadowy grasp over the magnificent scope of territory between here and Forest Grove, it deters any capital from building the road. In the present instance Astoria has sufficient proof. Here among us is a man representing millions, a man who has made the building and operating of railroads the study of his life, whose attention has been attracted by the inviting field for investment, who has become convinced of the financial desirability of the enterprise, whose requests have been liberally responded to by Astoria, and who goes on to-day's steamer with nothing definite arranged, solely because of the uncertainty occasioned by the existence of a grant which was in all justice forfeited eight years ago by non-compliance with the conditions coupled with its creation, but which still floats like a low-hung storm-cloud between that territory and the sun of prosperity."

The apparently unanimous expression of public sentiment of the citizens interested in connection with events occurring leads us to conclude that as a matter of policy the grant is not needed to secure the construction of a road; indeed, that one will be built sooner without it than with it in the hands of the present claimant.

On the foregoing state of facts, none of which are in dispute, the question is presented as to what is the proper action for this Congress as to this grant.

It must be remembered that under the law the grant of lands to aid in the construction of this road is a grant in presenti, and the conditions in the act conditions subsequent (Rutherford vs. Green's Heirs, 2 Wheat.; Luessen vs. Price, 12 How., 59; Schulenberg vs. Harriman, 21 Wall., 44; Van Wyck vs. Knevals, 16 Otto; Opinion Attorney-General Devens, 16 Opinions Attorneys-General, page —; Opinion Attorney-General Brewster, U. S. Senate Ex. Doc. 31, first sess. 48th Cong.); that the legal title to all the land is in the railroad company; and your committee also agree with the counsel for the company that the legal title so conveyed by the granting act is a subject of sale and transfer by the original grantee (subject, as we insist and shall show, to the condition contained in the act). So that no question arises as to the alleged transfer of the grant by the Oregon Central to the Oregon and California, so far as the passing of the legal title, as such, is concerned. We agree that the last-named company took by the transfer all that the first corporation had, and stood where the Oregon Central stood, with the legal title to the grant and charged with the conditions imposed and the burdens created by the act.

This brings us, then, to consider the real question at issue; and as this is the first grant we have considered where the question is presented of the effect legally of part performance by the grantee or its "successor and assign," of the conditions named in the granting act, and as the determination of that question in this case is to be a precedent, necessarily, for the action of the committee in subsequent cases, in like character of grant, we have given the subject careful attention, and believe our conclusions fully warranted.

Upon the agreed statement that the grant was one in presenti, counsel for the company insist that this grant is materially and radically different from any grant ever made by Congress before or since in these two very material respects:

First. There is no reservation in it whatever of any kind or character of a right to re-enter for condition broken; and

Second. There is no reservation whatever of any right to alter, amend, or repeal the act. Nor is there, third, as in the North Pacific and Atlantic Pacific, any reservation of a right upon the part of Congress, in case the grantee does not complete the road within the time specified, "to do any and all acts and things which may be needful and necessary to insure a speedy completion of the road."

All there is in the act upon the subject of a condition is in these words:

"SEC. 6. And the foregoing grant is upon condition that said company shall complete a section of twenty or more miles of said railroad and telegraph within two years, and the entire railroad and telegraph within six years from the same date."

Counsel call attention to the fact that in grants of this character, before and since, Congress has generally, in terms, provided for forfeiture for breach of the expressed condition, and that in this case there is a departure in the language, in this, that all that section 6 provides is as above recited; and, quoting from his brief:

"It is respectfully insisted that the clause in the last section of the act (section 6) requiring said company to complete a section of twenty or more miles within two years, and the entire road within six years from the date of the grant, inasmuch as there is no clause of reverter or right of entry for condition broken, and no reservation of any right to alter, amend, or appeal, can not be held a condition, but simply a direction; it is not a limitation, but merely declaratory of the desire of Congress in the premises, and the failure to keep which on the part of the company gives no right to forfeiture."

We do not deem it necessary to argue that proposition. No language could be used more apt to make the estate one on condition subsequent than is used in this act. The words are of present grant "there is hereby granted," and then section 6, "and the foregoing grant is upon condition," &c.

This has always been held by the Supreme Court of the United States, as shown by the cases cited above, to make the grant one on condition subsequent. (See those cases.)

Again, the counsel urges:

"But conceding for the present that the words used in the last section are sufficient to create a condition, it is respectfully insisted that there being no express reservation either of a right to re-enter, or to alter, or repeal, Congress has no power to declare a forfeiture, and it can be done, if at all, by the judiciary alone. That the very most that Congress could do in this case would be to instruct the Attorney-General to institute the necessary proceedings to have a judicial forfeiture declared.

"There being no such reservation in the grant of May 4, 1870, it follows that the judiciary only, and not Congress, can declare a forfeiture on account of failure to perform conditions.

"And, aside from all technical rules, it is respectfully submitted that the judiciary, and not the legislative department, is the one to which all these questions of failure to comply with conditions subsequent should be remitted. The questions to be determined are essentially of a judicial and not of a legislative nature."

We considered the same question in the Texas Pacific case, and are content to repeat here what we said there as to both propositions, namely, first, the lack of power to declare forfeiture because of a want of express reservation of the right; and, second, that declaring a forfeiture is a judicial proceeding purely. We said in that case:

"As has been stated, we have had the benefit of legal argument by some of the most eminent counsel in the land, and the claim by this company to the grant on legal grounds may be stated in this way:

"By the act making the grant the title to the land passed to the Texas Pacific—the act was a grant in præsenti, with a condition subsequent.

"The Texas Pacific thus being vested with legal title (although subject to the condition subsequent, which contained, among other things, the building of the road to San Diego, and the completing the whole line by May 2, 1882, and that there should be no consolidation with any competing line, yet), the legal title was an assignable interest, which could be conveyed, and that by the deed made by the Texas Pacific January 18, 1882, to the Southern Pacific, it became vested with the legal title to all land, and because Congress did not, in making the grant and coupling with it a condition subsequent, in express terms to reserve to itself the power to declare the grant forfeited for breach of the condition if it should not be complied with, therefore no right of forfeiture exists, and the hands of Congress are tied, and the Government is powerless to resume the grant by reason of such omission.

"In other words, generally stated, the distinguished counsel for the company declares that in law the power to declare a forfeiture of a grant made on condition subsequent for breach of the condition must be reserved to the grantor by express terms in the act making the grant, or it does not exist.

"No authority was produced to the committee except the statement of the attorneys asserting this extraordinary doctrine in support of it; but the interests being so great, we have examined the books on the question, and are not able to find a single authority in support of the proposition, and we believe none can be found.

"On the contrary, Washburn on Real Property, volume 2, third edition, page 15, asserts the rule to be:

"'Where the condition of a grant is expressed there is no need of reserving a right of entry for a breach thereof in order to enable the grantor to avail himself of it.'

"See also Jackson vs. Allen, 3 Cowan, 220; Gray vs. Blanchard, 8 Pick., 284; Littleton section 331.

"Indeed, all the cases we can find, as well as the text-books, are in harmony and to the same effect; so we do not present argument upon it here.

"Counsel also urge that under the law a forfeiture of a grant is purely a judicial question, one for the courts alone, and that Congress has no power in the matter.

"We are of different opinion. It seems perfectly clear to this committee that a declaration of forfeiture is only the act of the grantor asserting his right to resume the grant, to be exercised at his option, terminating an estate for breach of the condition on which it is granted. The power rests with him; it is at his option whether he will exercise it or not; purely a matter of discretion, with the exercise of which the courts have nothing to do; and until it is exercised there is nothing on which the court can act.

"When forfeiture is declared and resumption of ownership asserted by the grantor, then the court may be invoked to declare whether the right existed or whether it had been effectively exercised; but the question of forfeiture is with the grantor, personal or legislative, as the grant is private or public, and the judiciary has no jurisdiction whatever until after the grantor has acted to assert his or its right to declare the forfeiture, and then the grantee may invoke the judiciary.

"To us this is too clear to be regarded as debatable or needing elaboration."

To this it might be added that the judicial proceedings suggested as a necessity by the opponents of forfeiture must be specially authorized by Congress. Nobody pretends that the Department of Justice could institute any such proceeding without an express act of Congress authorizing it; therefore the whole matter comes back to this, that affirmative legislation must be had, and we are clearly of opinion that Congress is the only body to exercise the option of reclaiming the lapsed grants.

No difficulty has arisen in any of these cases as to the fact of non-performance; indeed, in all of them breach of the condition is admitted; so there are no disputed questions of fact to be investigated; and whether the people shall preserve their own property is clearly a question more properly for the people to determine through their representatives than for any court. The Supreme Court, in United States vs. Repentigny (5 Wallace, 267), decided that an act of Congress is an equivalent for the ancient "inquest of office found."

The election to waive the foreiture or to enforce it rests with Congress.

It is a question of intention, and neither the executive nor judicial department of the Government can know what the pleasure of Congress may be, and can not, therefore, act to revest the title until Congress has declared its intention in that regard.

As to the grant, then, as an entirety, as a whole, the counsel insists that there is no power whatever in Congress to deal with it, and that we not only can not but ought not to forfeit it.

And here it may be well to call the attention of the House especially to the position of this company. It not only never began the construction of the road for which the grant was given, namely, to Astoria; it simply built out from Portland toward and up the Willamette Valley, for purposes of its own, to meet the California system, as is agreed by the counsel, and for ten years has utterly failed and refused to move a spade of earth toward Astoria; not only this, but the company has, as we have shown by the letter of Mr. Villard, "utterly abandoned the project."

This is admitted by counsel; there is no pretense that there is any change in the policy of the company, no promise by any one in authority that any attempt will be made to do any work on the road, yet the counsel for it argues that we can not and ought not to attempt to take back this great grant for settlement.

Refusing to build the road and earn the land; abandoning the project absolutely, they insist that no power exists in Congress to retake the title, but these lands must lie as a waif beyond our power. This is the frontier line of corporation assurance in their claims to the public lands. We conclude that we have the power to declare a forfeiture, and the question is, how far does it extend?

In cases like this, where there is no limitation in the act on the power, the declaration of forfeiture relates back to the date of the grant, and the Government is restored to its original estate.

This follows from the nature of the estate granted; the estate is one on condition subsequent—that is, an estate liable to terminate and become no estate on the happening or non-happening of some event in the future.

Here the legal title to the grant as an entirety passed to the company by the act as fully and completely as though the patents had issued at that date, subject, of course, to the conditions named in the grant.

Let this be kept clearly in mind: that the act passed the legal title and conveyed all the estate which the grantee could get; the subsequent building of the road and the issuing of patents only gave precision to the grant, but did not add to or strengthen the title which the company had under the act. What it had, it derived wholly from the act making the grant. This the Supreme Court has expressly and repeatedly decided. There has been an absolute breach of the condition of this grant since May 4, 1876, and an abandonment of the project. Therefore there is a right of forfeiture. How far does it extend?

In Sheppard's Touchstone, 154, it is said:

"It is generally true that he that doth enter for a condition broken doth make the estate void ab initio, and that he shall be in of his first estate in the same course and manner as it was when he departed with the possession and at the time of the making of the condition. And hence it is that if there be any charge or incumbrance on the lands, as if the lessee of land upon condition grant a rent charge out of the land or enter into a statute or recognizance and the cognusee has the land in execution and this charge is after the condition is made, in this case when the condition is broken and the party doth re-enter he shall by relation avoid the rent, statute, and recognizance and hold the land freed from them all."

The same doctrine is found in other authorities. Thus in Coke-Littleton, 202*a*, it is said broadly:

"He who enters for breach of condition regularly shall have the land of his first estate."

At 201*a* it is said:

"In these cases if the rent be not paid at such time or before such time limited and specified within the condition comprised in the indenture, then may the feoffer or his heirs enter into such lands or tenements and then in his former estate to have and to hold and the feoffee quite to ouste thereof."

This is the language of Littleton. Coke says:

"Regularly it is true he that entereth for a condition broken shall be seized in his first estate or of that estate which he had at the time of the estate made upon condition, but yet this fayleth in many cases."

Coke goes on to specify the cases in which it "fayleth." They are placed under the two heads of "impossibility" and "necessity," and have no application here.

Butler and Hargreaves, in their note to this passage, say:

"It may be further observed: First, That as the entry of the feoffer on the feoffee for a condition broken defeats the estate to which the condition was annexed, so it defeats all rights and incidents annexed to that estate, as dower, &c., and all mesne incumbrances of the feoffer."

The same doctrine is in 1 Rolle Abridg., 474, 617. Comyn's Dig., tit. Condition, 0. 6.

So in Greenleaf's Cruise on Real Property, vol. 2, p. 25, sec. 10 (in Greenleaf's edition the original six volumes are bound in three, and the passage quoted is therefore in his first volume as bound), it is said:

"Where a particular time is appointed for the performance of a condition, it must be performed at or before that time."

At page 40, sec. 39, it is said:

"Upon the breach of a condition the feoffer or grantor, or his heir, becomes entitled to the estate to which such condition was annexed."

At page 44, sec. 52, it is said:

"Where a person enters for a condition broken the estate becomes void, ab initio; the person who enters is again seized of his original estate in the same manner as if he had never conveyed it away. And as the entry of the feoffer on the feoffee for a condition broken defeats the estate to which the condition was annexed, so it defeats all rights and incidents annexed to that estate, together with all charges and incumbrances created by the feoffee during his possession; for upon the entry of the feoffer he becomes seized of an estate paramount to that which was subject to these charges."

In section 53 the writer says that on re-entry a rent charge or judgment is gone; and in section 54 he says the dower of the feoffee's wife is gone on re-entry.

Washburn on Real Property, volume 2, sec. 13, says:

"When such entry had been made the effect was to reduce the estate to the same plight and cause it to be held in the same terms as if the estate to which the condition was annexed had not been granted."

At page 457, same volume, sec. 24, it is said that an estate subject to a condition does not lose its capacity of being sold or devised in the same manner as an indefeasible estate, but that the purchaser or whoever takes the estate will take it subject to the condition annexed.

Kent declares the law to the same effect:

"Persons who have an estate or freehold subject to a condition are seized, and may convey, though the estate will continue defeasible until the condition be performed or released, or is barred by statute of limitations or by estoppel."

Again he says:

"Laches are chargeable upon the grantee (of an estate subject to condition), even though such grantee or his assignee be an infant or feme covert for non-performance of the condition annexed to the estate."—Kent's Commentaries, volume 4, pages 125, 126.

As held in the case of Jackson vs. Crisler (1 John. Cas., 125, 126), he who purchases an estate of a grantee who holds upon a condition subsequent takes the estate subject to the condition. He must look to the title and take it as it exists.

The Supreme Court of the United States has expressly decided this to be the law in the well-considered case of Foxcroft vs. Mallet (4 How., 353). The State of Massachusetts gave a large body of land in Maine to Williams College on the condition that thirty settlers in each township might each have one hundred acres for $5. The college conveyed a township to Ingersoll, who conveyed 6,000 acres of the same to Samuel Mallet, subject to the condition that it should bear its proportion of that burden.

Mallet gave back to college a mortgage upon all the land without expressly referring to that condition in his title, though he did refer to the deed.

That mortgage was afterward foreclosed and the lands were conveyed thereunder by mesne conveyances to Foxcroft, who claimed to own the whole tract by title superior to David Mallet, one of the settlers who took title after the mortgage was made. The court decide that the mortgagor could not pass by mortgage a greater interest than he obtains; that—

"The condition or charge was on the land as an incumbrance by the very terms of the deed to him, and he could not if he tried convey a title to the land which should be free from it. Such a condition attaches to the land wherever it goes, although the same should pass through a hundred hands. In our view it operates like a covenant which runs with the land, and all assignees are bound by covenants real that run with the land." (Page 377.)

The case of Schulenberg vs. Harriman, 21 Wallace, 44, has been cited as against this doctrine, but an examination of that case will show that it is in harmony with the principle. That case arose on this state of fact:

A grant was made to the State of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of a certain railroad.

The road was not built within the time—ten years—and after its expiration the plaintiff went upon the land and cut a lot of trees growing upon it and floated them off with others.

The defendant, as agent for the State, seized the logs as its property, they having been cut from the lands, the title to which was in the State, under the grant, as he insisted.

The plaintiff replevied them, and as to the claim that the title was in the State by the grant made these points:

(1.) That the legal title did not pass by the act of the State; that the act did not vest the title in presenti; that the State was only an agent for the future disposition of them.

(2.) If the title passed to the State by said acts, such title reverted to the United States, no part of the road having been built at the expiration of the period limited in the grant, the condition being, "If the road is not completed within ten years no further sale shall be made, and the lands unsold shall revert to the United States."

So the precise question was whether there was title in the State sufficient to maintain trespass or replevin against a wrongdoer.

The court held that the grant was one in presenti; that the legal title to the lands passed to the State by the act itself; that the conditions in the act were conditions subsequent, and as to them the court said:

"The provision that all lands remaining unsold after ten years should revert to the United States if the road be not then completed is no more than a provision that the grant shall be void if a condition subsequent be not performed; * * * that it is the settled law that no one can take advantage of the non-performance of a condition subsequent annexed to an estate in fee but the grantor or his heirs, or the successors of the grantor, if the grant proceed from an artificial person, and if they do not see fit to enforce a forfeiture on that ground the title remains unimpaired in the grantee.

"In what manner the reserved right of the grantor for breach of the condition must be asserted so as to restore the estate depends upon the character of the grant. If it be a private grant that right must be asserted by entry or its equivalent; if the grant be a public one it must be asserted by judicial proceedings authorized by law, * * * or there must be some legislative assertion of ownership of property for breach of the condition, such as an act directing the possession and appropriation of the property or that it be offered for sale or settlement."

Upon the question of sales by the State after failure to complete the road within the ten years the court says:

"The provision in the act of Congress of 1856 that all lands remaining unsold after ten years shall revert to the United States, if the road be not then completed, is no more than a provision that the grant shall be void if the condition subsequent be not performed. * * * The prohibition against further sales, if the road be not completed within the period prescribed, adds nothing to the force of the provision. A cessation of sales in that event is implied in the condition that the lands shall then revert: if the condition be not enforced the power to sell continues as before the breach, limited only by the object of the grant and the manner of sale prescribed in the act.

"It was further held that where no action had been taken to assert forfeiture of the estate granted by the act, the title remains 'in the State as completely as it existed on the day when the title by location of the route of the railroad acquired precision and became attached to the adjoining alternate sections.'"

The court therefore held that the plaintiff could not recover the logs, and, as must be apparent, the only question dealt with was the one of legal title, and of course, as the legal title (though subject to the condition subsequent) was in the State by the grant, it would continue there until Congress took advantage of the breach of the condition by asserting a forfeiture.

This is in harmony with the text-books; the legal title is in the State or the corporation, as the case may be, and the estate may be sold, conveyed, and mortgaged precisely as though the condition was not annexed.

Washburn says, in his work on real property, volume 2, page 452, section 24:

"An estate subject to a condition does not lose its capacity of being sold or devised in the same manner as an indefeasible estate, but the purchaser or whoever takes the estate will take it subject to the condition annexed. So, in Kent's Commentaries, volume 4, pages 125-126, it is said: 'Persons who have an estate or freehold, subject to a condition, are seized and may convey, though the estate will continue defeasible until the condition be performed or released, or is barred by the statute of limitations or by estoppel.'"

Foxcroft vs. Mallet, 4 Howard, 353, also contains a full exposition of the law on this subject worthy of careful reading.

But Van Wyck vs. Knevals, 16 Otto, 365, is relied on as an authority, that by a partial performance by the company it earns, so to speak, a proportional amount of its grant as to all the road constructed before a declaration of forfeiture, in the proportion to the whole grant that the constructed portion of the road bears to the whole length of the line. The question was between individuals, and as to priority of right, in this state of case. Van Wyck entered the land April 13, 1870, and received a patent therefor November 15, 1871.

The map of definite location of the road, which gives precision to the grant, was filed in the Department of the Interior March 25, 1870, accepted the same day, forwarded to the local land office April 8, 1870, and received there April 15, 1870. In the mean time Van Wyck had made his entry, and the question was whether the filing of map or the notice at the local land office gave the right to the company to the land, Knevals claiming from the company. On that question the court held for Knevals that the filing of the map and its acceptance by the Department fixed the right.

The condition in the grant in question was as follows:

"Provided further, That if said road is not completed within ten years from the date of the acceptance of the grant hereinbefore made the lands remaining unpatented shall revert to the United States."

And on the question we are considering, the language of the court relied on by those denying the right of absolute forfeiture is as follows:

"The defendant [Van Wyck] having failed to establish the validity of his own title, attacks the right of the company to the lands covered by the grant, alleging that the company never completed the construction of the entire road for which the grant was made; that after filing its map with the Secretary of the Interior, it changed for part of the distance the route of the road, and that it never complied with the conditions of the law of Nebraska for the extension of its road within the limits of that State. We do not deem these objections, when considered with the facts on which they are based, as having any force. There is to them a ready and conclusive answer. Assuming that the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad, with which the company's road connected, was not, as averred by the complainant, a branch of the Union Pacific Railroad, and that, therefore, the company's proposed road was not entirely completed, the fact remains that the company constructed a portion of the proposed road, and that portion was accepted as completed in the manner required by the act of Congress. Patents for some of the adjoining sections were accordingly issued to the company, and a right to all of them, not specially reserved by the condition of the grant, vested in it. So far as that portion of the road which was completed and accepted is concerned, the contract of the company was executed, and as to the lands patented, the transaction on the part of the Government was closed, and the title of the company perfected. The right of the company to the remaining odd-numbered sections adjoining the road completed and accepted (not reserved) is equally clear.

"If the whole road has not been completed any forfeiture consequent thereon can be asserted only by the grantor, the United States, through judicial proceedings or through the action of Congress. (Schulenberg vs. Harriman, 21 Wall., 44.) A third party can not take upon himself to enforce conditions attached to the grant when the Government does not complain of their breach.

"All, then, that the court decides is that, as between the Government and the company, the title passed by the grant; it acquired precision by filing the map without regard to the question of notice; that, under the act, when the lands were patented, the transaction is closed, and for the obvious reason that, in the condition in the grant, the act of revertitur, in a declaration of forfeiture is restricted to "the lands remaining unpatented."

Let it be remembered that in the acts making these grants various powers are conferred and various restrictions on the power of forfeiture are provided, and we agree that Congress may impose restrictions upon the power to declare a forfeiture in case of default; that it may bind the Government by a limitation as to the extent of the reversion, as to what lands shall be affected by the assertion of the right, and what shall be exempted from the operation of the forfeiture; further, that whatever limits the act itself or subsequent legislation imposes on the power to declare forfeiture, either as to the manner of its exercise or the extent to which it shall extend, or as to what shall be exempted from its operation, subsequent Congresses are bound.

In the earlier grants, like that to Illinois for the Illinois Central, the power to declare forfeiture was restricted to this: that if the railroad was not completed within ten years, the State should pay the United States what it received upon sales by it; the title of the purchasers to remain valid; the title to the residue of the lands to reinvest in the United States as if the act had not been passed. (9 Stat., p. 467.)

In later grants, like those to Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, and other States, in 11, 13, and 14 Stat. at Large, the restriction on the power of forfeiture was that if the roads were not completed within the time fixed "no further sales shall be made, and the lands unsold shall revert to the United States."

Or, like the cases of the Wisconsin Central, and Lake Superior, and Michigan Railroads (13 Stat., pages 64 and 66), where, if the roads were not completed, "no further patents shall be issued to the company, and no further sales shall be made, and the lands unsold shall revert to the United States."

Or, like the grants to Arkansas, Minnesota, and Missouri (14 Stat., pages 83 and 87), where, if the roads were not completed as required, "the lands not patented shall revert to the United States."

Or, like the grant to Iowa (13 Stat., 72), for the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad, "if the road be not completed within ten years, the lands not patented shall revert to the State for the purpose of securing the completion of the road; and should the State fail to complete the road within five years after the ten years, then the lands undisposed of shall revert to the United States."

Or, like the California and Oregon, and the Oregon and California grants, 14 Stat., 239, if the roads were not completed, or failed to file assent as required, "the act shall be null and void, and all lands not conveyed by patent at the date of such failure shall revert to the United States."

Or, like the Northern Pacific act, 13 Stat., 365, the Atlantic and Pacific act, and the Southern Pacific act, 14 Stat., 292, the Texas Pacific act, and the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg act, 16 Stat., 573, where the right of forfeiture was not restricted, but left as a common law (unless modified by the subsequently conferred power to mortgage, not necessary to be noticed now and here) with the imposition of further conditions, "that the United States might, in case of default, do any and all acts necessary to insure the speedy completion of the road."

Or, as in the case, in the act we are now considering, where the "estate on conditions" simply is granted, and no restriction whatever on the power of forfeiture. These different classes of conditions and restrictions on the power we are discussing show the varying moods of Congress on the question, and each case must be examined, when the exercise of the power is invoked, under the particular terms of the condition and the restriction, if any, in it, and as to them all this clearly follows under the authorities; that where, as in this case, the grant stands on common-law grounds, without restriction on the power by act of Congress, the forfeiture restores the whole grant as it was "at the date of it, at the time of making the condition," nothing but full performance under the act or waiver by some expressed enactment will prevent it.

Although the attention of the learned counsel for the company was especially called to this question (and time given to examine into it), namely, the power to declare an absolute forfeiture of this grant notwithstanding a portion of the road has been built within the time, not an authority has been produced to the committee showing or tending to show that the power does not exist; nor does the committee believe that a respectable authority can be produced either elementary or among the reported cases decided by the courts, holding that the power to declare an absolute forfeiture is not in the grantor in cases like this where there is no restriction in the act, or any subsequent enactment.

There is no question of constructive waiver in this case, because nothing has been done since the expiration of the time within which the road was to have been built. This, the committee think, determines the legal question, and that Congress has the power to declare full forfeiture.

But having the power, it does not follow that it ought to be exercised.

The question of proper policy in the exercise of a wise and just discretion is frequently more difficult of solution than the one of legal right. In this case there appears absolutely no equity or claim to favorable consideration for aid for that part of the road built.

As clearly appears, it was not intended as part of the road Congress desired. The branch was to be from a "point of junction" with the main line, near Forest Grove, clearly contemplating a main line; no road was ever built beyond that point, but constructed road, used as part of another main line up to Corvallis and south of that, to secure, not the road aided by Congress, but, as counsel admit, "for the purpose of having a better basis of credit to secure as speedily as possible the completion of the uncompleted portions of both roads from Roseberg south to a connection with the Central Pacific," practically to secure and control the lines of transportation in the hands of Messrs. Huntington and Villard, and leave Astoria shut out from the privileges Congress intended she should have.

Not only so, but all these years, by asserting that he intended to build the road, others were deterred from entering upon the work free of expense to the Government, and this vast area of land, 1,500,000 acres, withheld from sale and settlement by this "dog-in-the-manger" policy.

The letter of Mr. Gaston, former president of this company, inserted above, fully explains this.

Mr. Villard's company, he writes, has "abandoned the project" of building the road.

We submit they ought to abandon the grant; and we report the annexed bill forfeiting the grant, for favorable action and passage.

We have not been able to learn certainly whether this company has assumed the right to dispose of any of these lands to settlers or not, but are led to believe that it has to some extent; and to guard against any possible wrong, and to do justice to any citizen who may ignorantly have purchased any of these lands, we add a section giving such persons, if there be any, a prior right to the land that they assume to purchase of the company, for reasons which will suggest themselves to the House on reading the section, and commend themselves to its judgment.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, I only wish, at the outset of this discussion, to make a brief statement as to the substantial features of this bill, and in doing so I shall occupy only so much time as the gravity of the case would seem to require.

This bill comes to this House unanimously reported from the Committee on Public Lands. It involves 1,130,800 acres of the public lands. The claim which is made to a portion of it is made solely by the Oregon Central Railroad Company. No other corporation is interested in it, so far as we know. There is neither legal nor equitable claim on the part of this corporation to a single acre of the land which is involved. Indeed, it is conceded by the legal representatives of the railroad company, that if there is in this Congress the legal right to assert a forfeiture they have no legal claim to a single acre of the land. It is only just to say that a claim is made equitably to perhaps 320,000 acres of the land.

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Speaker, I regard this measure as the pioneer in the discussion that is to follow regarding this question of forfeitures; and I sincerely hope that we shall have order so that the gentleman from Illinois can be distinctly heard in the Hall. This is the beginning of the discussion of these railroad grants, and I insist that there shall be order during the discussion, or that we shall suspend business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will endeavor to preserve order, and gentlemen on the floor will cease conversation.

Mr. PAYSON. I take it, Mr. Speaker, that I am entirely safe in saying that if there is any one question upon which public sentiment is united in this country, the whole nation over, it is that every acre of the public domain that is now being claimed by these corporations to which they have not a clear, legal right, or a countervailing equitable claim, that every acre of it shall be restored to the public domain and made subject to sale and settlement under existing law. So I shall waste no time in the discussion of that proposition as to whether there is a public demand for this kind of legislation.

Coming, then, to the facts in this case upon which the House will be called to vote, they may be briefly, and, I think, clearly stated in about this way: In 1870 this grant of the public domain was made to this railroad company as the consideration for the building of a railroad line from Portland to Astoria. Assuming that the House is familiar with the geography of that country, I will simply state that the distance from Portland to Astoria is one hundred and twenty-two miles. The grant was made for the building of this railroad, and the authority was given to build a branch line from a suitable point of junction, in the language of the act, near Forest Grove, which is distant twenty-five miles from Portland, up to Willamette Valley, toward the Oregon State line, at a place called McMinnville, in the State of Oregon, twenty-two miles distant. This entire road was to be constructed within six years from the date of the grant. The time expired, therefore, in May, 1876.

The road was not built——

Mr. BELFORD rose.

Mr. PAYSON. If the gentleman will not interrupt me, I will state all of the facts in connection with the matter, and as to every fact which I shall state I think there will be no dispute even by the only gentleman whom I have heard of as opposed to the bill. I refer to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. GEORGE].

The construction of this road was begun at Portland. I should say in passing that an examination of the debates in this House as well as in the Senate at the time the grant was made will show that the principal object of making the grant was to secure the connection—a railroad connection—between Portland, on the Willamette River, in the interior of Oregon, and Astoria, on the Pacific coast. The construction of the road was commenced within the time and forty-seven and one-half miles of the road built within the period specified.

The road was constructed out to Forest Grove, then up the Willamette Valley to McMinnville, in all forty-seven and one-half miles, within the period prescribed by the act.

Mr. BELFORD. Will my friend from Illinois permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PAYSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BELFORD. Did not a panic come on the country in 1873, and was not every business interest prostrated and paralyzed by reason of that panic, and especially in relation to the construction of railways?

Mr. PAYSON. As a matter of the financial history of this country, I will say yes. But that had nothing whatever to do with this enterprise.

I was about to state, when interrupted by the gentleman from Colorado, that the construction of this road came into the hands of Mr. Henry Villard, who had succeeded to the control of the entire railroad system in Oregon, and not only that, but of the Oregon Navigation Company's line of transportation on the Columbia River. Desiring to make a connection between this line and the Huntington railroad system in California, which was extending its road northward to the Oregon line, Mr. Villard and his associates abandoned absolutely the construction of this main line of road in consideration of which this grant of land was made. Instead of treating it as a part of the main plan they used it merely as a factor in the scheme of connecting the Oregon system with the south.

A mortgage put upon it for a million and a half of dollars was used to secure terminal facilities in the city of Portland, and not a dollar of it in perfecting the scheme for which Congress made this great grant of land.

To make myself understood by an illustration which we will all understand, and anticipating perhaps the argument that will be advanced by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. GEORGE], let me say the situation is precisely this as to this constructed piece of road: Suppose Congress made a grant to some company to build a railroad from this Capitol to Georgetown along Pennsylvania avenue, with a branch up Four-and-a-half street to the City Hall. That is an illustration of the situation. The railroad company commence and build down Pennsylvania avenue, then turn up to the City Hall, and for purposes of their own continue their line to the city of Baltimore and abandon absolutely the balance of the road from Four-and-a-half street to Georgetown. That is the case precisely.

I hold in my hand the printed copy of a letter from Mr. Villard to the Astoria Chamber of Commerce, written in 1883. After having so long held that grant of land as an absolute pall on its settlement and sale, he announces to these people that he absolutely and utterly abandons the project and does not intend to construct the road.

During the last eight or ten years—the proof is before us—corporations have been organized and individuals have associated themselves together and have been willing to build this road without a dollar of subsidy or without an acre of land. And as a part of the current history of the transaction I may state that only one month ago in the city of Astoria, on the assumption that this House would indorse the action of your committee relating to this grant, steps were being taken to build this road without a dollar of aid from the Government, with the amount perhaps of $100,000 of local aid from the citizens of Astoria.

There is the case in a nutshell, and all there is of it. I do not care to go into the legal argument here, for it is absolutely unnecessary, as to the power of Congress to declare a forfeiture in this act; nor do I intend to waste the time of this House in arguing the question of policy outside the question of right so far as regards the forty-seven and a half miles of constructed road.

Mr. HORR. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. PAYSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HORR. How much of this road has been built on the line of the land grant?

Mr. PAYSON. Twenty-five miles.

Mr. HORR. And none along the rest of it?

Mr. PAYSON. None of the rest built or attempted to be built.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Do you forfeit the grant along the twenty-five miles?

Mr. PAYSON. We do.

Mr. HORR. What is the length of the whole line?

Mr. PAYSON. One hundred and twenty-five miles.

Mr. HORR. I want to get at the fact. In the grant of this land was there provision made that the company should get lands as certain portions of their road were completed?

Mr. PAYSON. That was provided in the act.

Mr. HORR. Have the patents for those lands been issued?

Mr. PAYSON. There has never been any patent issued.

Mr. HORR. Were the company entitled to patents for the lands?

Mr. PAYSON. No, sir; they were never entitled to an acre of the land, as the committee unanimously agree.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Not entitled to any, even for the part they built?

Mr. HORR. If the lands were to be patented to the company as they went along with the construction of the road, why did they not get the patents?

Mr. PAYSON. I do not know. The Interior Department refused to issue the patents.

Mr. HORR. Were they not entitled to them on the portion of the road constructed?

Mr. PAYSON. They were not entitled to them.

Mr. HORR. Why were they not entitled to them?

Mr. PAYSON. Because the grant was on the condition that the entire road was to be completed prior to May 10, 1876, and it never was completed, but was abandoned.

Mr. HORR. I understand you to say that they did build a portion of the road.

Mr. PAYSON. They did; but the Interior Department regard it, as I regard it, and as I think every lawyer will regard it, that unless that road is constructed they are not entitled to any land.

Mr. HORR. I think I now understand you.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The gentleman has mostly answered the question which I wish to ask him, which is whether the Committee on Public Lands consider this company entitled to any part of the grant proportionately to the amount of road they had built, or whether there had been patented to the company any land for the portion built?

Mr. PAYSON. There has been none patented to them.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And the company is entitled to none?

Mr. PAYSON. We all agree to that.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And the committee so report?

Mr. PAYSON. The committee so report.

Mr. RAY, of New York. The gentleman says that no road has been built over this precise line. I would ask him if any road has been constructed between the terminal points or upon a substantial parallel line?

Mr. PAYSON. There is no railroad communication between Portland and the interior in any way.

Mr. GEORGE. Between Portland and the interior?

Mr. PAYSON. I should say between Astoria and the interior. I believe that is all I care to say in the presentation of this matter in the outset, and I will reserve the remainder of my time, unless some gentleman desires to ask me a question.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. The gentleman says that this company is not entitled in law to any of this land. Are they entitled to any in equity?

Mr. PAYSON. They are not, and the gentleman would have understood my reasons for saying so if he had heard what I had said in the opening of my remarks. I will repeat what I have said in reference to it.

Mr. LACEY. I would suggest that questions should be addressed to the Chair, so that we may hear what the questions are and appreciate the answers.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. MILLARD. I would like to ask the gentleman a single question.

Mr. PAYSON. Certainly.

Mr. MILLARD. Was not this road to be built in sections of twenty miles?

Mr. PAYSON. I think so.

Mr. MILLARD. And were not certain portions or sections of this road completed and accepted by the Government?

Mr. PAYSON. I think so.

Mr. MILLARD. And you propose by this bill to forfeit not only the lands earned by the company for the portions of the road which were constructed and accepted by the Government, but also all the lands which would come to the company had it constructed the other portion of the road?

Mr. PAYSON. Precisely; and for this reason. I will occupy a moment more of my own time in answering the question of the gentleman. Any lawyer who will examine this grant or who has listened to the reading of the report will see that the grant is one known among lawyers as a grant in præsenti, upon conditions subsequent, the conditions being that the road shall be completed as required by law.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The whole road.

Mr. PAYSON. Yes, the whole road. No matter what provisions may have been made as to details, no matter if there is a provision in the grant that the road may be examined in sections, or that patents may issue when those different sections are accepted by the Government, all the time that is subject to a reserved right on the part of Congress, to be exercised whenever, in its discretion, it chooses to exercise the right of declaring a forfeiture of the whole grant for breach of the conditions. The law is as well settled as that two and two make four in mathematics, that the issue of patents for sections accepted does not strengthen at all the title that the railroad company has to the land.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I wish to ask the gentleman one more question.

Mr. PAYSON. I yield to the gentleman with pleasure.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I understand that in this bill the rights of settlers on any of these lands are fully protected.

Mr. PAYSON. Yes, sir; I should have stated that at the outset. The railroad company has assumed to have the title to these lands, so that it has sold a large portion of this grant. We are advised that parties are now in possession claiming under the imperfect title which they obtained from the railroad company. The committee in this bill recommend that every purchaser from the railroad company shall be treated as though he was a purchaser from the Government to the extent of his purchase, and to validate the title in him to the lands he thus holds.

Mr. HORR. Do I understand that the company has exercised ownership over these lands?

Mr. PAYSON. They have assumed the right to sell the land to settlers upon this grant. More than that, and I am glad the gentleman has asked the question, though the act provides that the company shall sell to actual settlers only in quantities of one hundred and sixty acres to each settler, it has assumed the right to sell thousands of acres for the timber which is upon it to a single person or corporation, without any shadow of right or authority to do so.

Mr. HORR. Do their mortgages cover any of these lands?

Mr. PAYSON. They do. They have given a mortgage of $1,250,000 upon some of these lands; to what extent we are not advised, nor could we ascertain.

Mr. HORR. Now, do I understand the gentleman's position to be this: If a company goes on and completes a certain portion of its road in good faith under the terms of its contract, and is allowed to have lands patented as certain portions of the road are completed, it may go on and build perhaps one hundred and twenty miles in that way, and then, because the company does not build the rest of the road within the time, the Government has an equitable and moral right to declare the entire land forfeited and take away from the company what it has earned?

Mr. PAYSON. When the gentleman asks what we have a "moral right" to do, that is a question which every member will settle for himself. If he asks whether we have a legal right to do it, I say unhesitatingly yes; and I have never heard any lawyer, except some attorney for a railroad company, who ever denied the proposition. If the gentleman asks me whether we have an equitable right, I say to him that the question of equity must be settled by every member of this House in accordance with his notion of equity. If he asks me what my judgment is in this case, I answer promptly and say that I do not believe this railroad company has an equitable right to a single acre of this land, nor is there a member of the Committee on Public Lands who so believes.

Mr. HORR. That is not the question. Does the gentleman believe it possible for an equity to be created in a case of the kind I have stated?

Mr. PAYSON. Certainly I believe it; and the Committee on Public Lands so believe. There are bills on your Calendar in which we recognize this equitable right. We believe every case should stand on its merits, and wherever the forfeiture is opposed by any countervailing equity we recommend that such equity should be regarded. There are on your Calendar bills in which we have allowed some of these corporations millions of acres of land to which legally they have no more right than I have to the ground on which this Capitol stands; we allow the lands to the companies in such cases upon principles of equity.

But I do not propose in this discussion to argue the question of equity in those cases. I confine my remarks to the case under consideration now and here; and as to that I say there is neither a legal right nor an equitable right on the part of the company to an acre of land involved in this grant.

Mr. CANNON. I understand my colleague [Mr. PAYSON] to say that in this bill the rights of purchasers from this railroad company have been protected.

Mr. PAYSON. Absolutely.

Mr. CANNON. And I also understand him to say that a mortgage has been placed on all or some of the lands where the road has been completed to the extent of $1,250,000.

Mr. PAYSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. Now, does this bill protect the rights of the mortgagees?

Mr. PAYSON. It does not. It lets them stand precisely where the law leaves them. When the mortgage was negotiated the statute was open to the examination of the men who invested their money in that mortgage. They knew, or are presumed to have known, what they were doing. The Committee on Public Lands do not recognize that there is any obligation imposed upon Congress to protect the rights of everybody who from one motive or another may have invested money in that class of securities.

But as to the men who went there poor, who braved the dangers of frontier life and in good faith, in ignorance of the law, purchased lands from this railroad company, assuming that it had the power to sell what it had not the power to sell, we propose not to subject them to any evil or inconvenience but to treat them, on equitable grounds and equitable grounds alone, as if they were purchasers from the Government.

Mr. CANNON. Will my colleague yield to me for a question?

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I?

The SPEAKER. Thirty-two minutes.

Mr. PAYSON. Then I yield to my colleague.

Mr. CANNON. One other question in the same line, for it is right in point. I think the committee has done well in that respect so far as the settlers are concerned; but as I understand this mortgage of $1,250,000 was necessarily made to protect bonds which have been issued. Now presumably those bonds are held by various people——

Mr. PAYSON. I did not yield for a speech.

Mr. CANNON. Then I will ask my colleague this question, whether it is not as equitable to protect the widow or the orphan or the trust fund that may happen to hold one of these bonds secured by mortgage (who had the same notice as the settlers and no more) as it is to protect the settlers?

Mr. PAYSON. Very likely, Mr. Chairman, if the holders of the bonds were the widows and orphans that the gentleman refers to so feelingly, but observation of the business public in this country does not lead to the conclusion that the holders of these railroad securities belong to the class that my colleague would desire to protect here. I never happened to hear that any of these widows and orphans live in million-dollar houses in the city of New York.

Mr. WEAVER. I understand the gentleman to say that the bill as reported by the committee protects those who have purchased lands from the railroad company?

Mr. PAYSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WEAVER. And that the original act provided they should not purchase a quantity exceeding one hundred and sixty acres to each person?

Mr. PAYSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WEAVER. And further, the gentleman stated, as I understood, that in some cases they have purchased as high as a thousand acres.

Mr. PAYSON. Only the timber from it; not the fee of the land, but the timber from it.

Mr. WEAVER. As I understand, you do not provide in your bill for anybody in excess of one hundred and sixty acres of land? That I understand to be in accordance with the provisions of the act.

Mr. PAYSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. PAYSON. Yes; for a question.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Does the mortgage referred to by the gentleman from Illinois cover the entire land grant, or only a part of it?

Mr. PAYSON. It covers the entire grant to the company. Every thing they could mortgage. It has been stated, and never disputed——

Mr. BELFORD. Allow me to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. PAYSON. Yes, if you will make it brief. If my friend from Colorado will come at once in his happy vein to the point, I will be glad to hear him.

Mr. BELFORD. You have thirty-two minutes remaining of your time and certainly you can yield me one of them.

Mr. PAYSON. With pleasure.

Mr. BELFORD. You stated every lawyer connected with a railroad company——

Mr. PAYSON. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. BELFORD. Let me put my question. The gentleman stated on the floor of this House that nobody was opposed to this bill except the attorney of some railroad.

Mr. PAYSON. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. BELFORD. You said——

Mr. PAYSON. I can not yield to be misrepresented.

Mr. BELFORD. I have not the slightest idea of misrepresenting the gentleman from Illinois. Have I not uniformly authorized you, sir, to cast my vote in that committee according to your judgment?

Mr. PAYSON. Yes; you have.

Mr. BELFORD. I never was an attorney of a railroad company.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, I can not yield for that purpose.

Mr. BELFORD. For, sir, I am opposed to this whole theory.

Mr. PAYSON. There is no gentleman in the House whose good opinion I regard more than that of the gentleman from Colorado; and if he will not leave me for one minute, I wish to set myself right with him.

Mr. BELFORD. I have been listening to your speech with delight and approvingly.

Mr. PAYSON. The gentleman misunderstood me.

Mr. BELFORD. What did you say, then?

Mr. PAYSON. I said as a legal proposition I never heard any lawyer except an attorney for a railroad company deny the power on the part of Congress to declare forfeited every grant of this kind if Congress chose to exercise its option.

Mr. BELFORD. You are right in that.

Mr. PAYSON. If no other gentleman desires to ask me a question, I will reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. PAYSON. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Do I understand the gentleman from Illinois to state this validates the purchase of titles from the railroad company to the extent of one hundred and sixty acres? If so, I wish the gentleman to explain by what sort of law or equity such titles can be validated.

Mr. PAYSON. Simply as a matter of equitable necessity. The title as we take it under the law is subject to be forfeited, and the United States clearly would have the right to recognize an unauthorized sale on precisely the same doctrine if you should undertake to sell my horse without authority and the gentleman from Massachusetts should purchase it I could validate it if I chose to do so. In order to save any inconvenience resulting in declaring this entire grant forfeited, and allowing these settlers to come in and pre-empt and make homestead filings under the general law, the committee have thought, Mr. Speaker, it was not an improper thing to recommend they be treated as purchasers from the railroad company, having in the main paid for their little holdings, because the little amount they would have again to pay into the Treasury of the United States would be a mere bagatelle to us, but might amount to a vast deal to each of them. There is no rule of law requiring us to do it, but we recommend it because we think it is a gracious thing for a great Government like this of ours to do toward one of its citizens who is placed in the situation these citizens are, to recognize the purchase from the railroad company of a portion of the land included in the grant to which the railroad company have no title.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I understand the gentleman further to say it is his opinion this railroad company has no title either in law or equity.

Mr. PAYSON. You understood me correctly if you so understood me.

Mr. CUTCHEON. And that that appears from the public records—from the muniments of title, so to speak. Now, can any equity possibly arise in favor of these purchasers? In other words, can the title rise higher than its source?

Mr. PAYSON. As a matter of harsh law, no; but this same policy, I wish to say, the Committtee on Public Lands has adapted to every one of these grants we propose to forfeit—that is, to treat every man in possession as an actual settler; to treat him who is in possession in good faith under the color of law as having a just claim; to treat him as a purchaser from the Government. As a matter of harsh law, I agree they have no such claim, but we think it is a matter of equity we should extend toward them.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Then it amounts simply to a gratuity, or what may be called a donation, to these people?

Mr. PAYSON. Practically it amounts to that.

Mr. CHACE. May I ask the gentleman a single question in this connection?

Mr. PAYSON. I will yield for a question.

Mr. CHACE. As I understand the gentleman, he says that this company has issued bonds upon the lands which were granted to them under the original act?

Mr. PAYSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHACE. And that these bonds have been placed upon the market and sold?

Mr. PAYSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHACE. And that innocent purchasers are now in possession of these bonds—bonds which they have purchased upon the market believing them to be valid?

Mr. PAYSON. They have been sold in the markets, I have no doubt.

Mr. CHACE. Very well. Then why do you not recognize the equities of the holders or purchasers of those bonds as much as you do the rights of the people who purchased the lands?

Mr. PAYSON. Because, sir, in the judgment of the committee they did not rest on equal dignity and are not entitled to be so considered. An investment made in a railroad bond is an investment made ordinarily by a capitalist as such, and when he pays out his money for such a bond he does it with the understanding that he is taking all of the chances as to whether or not the railroad company will pay the bond or put itself in a position that it can avail itself of all of the securities to which it may be entitled under the grants made to it by the General Government. We regard, therefore, the equities of the settlers who have gone upon these lands for the purpose of establishing a home as of superior dignity and entitled to more consideration than the bondholders who have purchased the bonds on speculation. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. May I ask a question?

Mr. PAYSON. I will yield to my colleague for a question.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I desire to ask my colleague whether he understands that in this part of the land the titles to which have been validated, so to speak, to the purchasers it was the intention of the committee to make a distinction between purchasers who are actual settlers and those who are not?

Mr. PAYSON. No, there was no such intention. And I will state to my colleague that we did not take that into consideration, for this reason: The act which authorized the company to make the sales of these lands provides that they shall not sell in quantities larger than one hundred and sixty acres and to actual settlers. The act of Congress provides that; and we have information upon what we regard satisfactory advice that the railroad company has sold no lands in larger amounts than that to actual settlers, although they have assumed the right to sell the timber from large areas of these lands.

I now reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the gentleman has thirty minutes of his time yet remaining, instead of the time heretofore erroneously announced by the Chair.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill of the following title:

A bill (H. R. 4993) making it a felony for any person to falsely and fraudulently assume or pretend to be an officer or employé acting under authority of the United States or any department thereof, and prescribing the penalty therefor.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed and requested the concurrence of the House in a bill of the following title:

A bill (S. 1797) to authorize the construction of a railroad bridge across the Saint Croix River, in the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota.

FORFEITURE OF OREGON RAILROAD GRANTS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 181) to declare forfeited certain lands granted to aid in the construction of a railroad in Oregon, and to enforce the same by judicial proceedings.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, while I was anxious that this bill should receive consideration, in the belief that this House would amend its defects, I must say that as it stands reported by the committee it can not receive my support. In order that this House may fully understand its defects and may amend and perfect the bill, I shall endeavor to explain the situation.

Congress, by act passed fourteen years ago, gave the Oregon Central Railroad Company six years in which to build, and required that twenty miles or more should be constructed within two years, and that as often as twenty miles or more were completed patents for coterminous lands should be made to the company. Twenty miles and more were built within the first two years. These lands thus earned the bill proposes to forfeit in addition to the unearned part from Forest Grove to Astoria.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have prepared here a rough map which will show in a general way to the House the situation and geographical location. It will be seen from this map which I hold up in view of the House the location of this road and the relative position of the points named. [For map see next page.]

This bill proposes to forfeit every acre of the grant earned from Portland to McMinnville. Now, if this House is willing to do that, then let it pass the bill now under consideration. But if you agree with me that in justice and in equity and in law this company earned this grant from Portland to McMinnville, then vote with me to amend the bill by striking out that part which forfeits the earned portion, leaving that part which forfeits the unearned portion.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. GEORGE. Now I wish to call your attention again to the situation.

The whole of the upper and lower valley is interested in the extension to Astoria of this road. Many of the reasons exist to-day that prompted Congress to extend this aid in the first instance.

Mr. GLASCOCK. What is the distance from Forest Grove to Astoria?

Mr. GEORGE. The distance from Forest Grove to Astoria is ninety-seven miles. The road between those points has never been built, and the land is unearned.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Why was not that built?

Mr. GEORGE. It is a road difficult of construction, and although it runs through valuable timber lands, with excellent prospects for coal developments and soil of great richness, yet the country is much broken and with lands largely covered with underbrush and not generally settled; and assuming Portland and Astoria as terminal points, the road traffic would be in direct competition with river craft and deep-sea going ships. I believe that this road needs the aid of a land grant to insure its completion in the near future. The present company after careful survey announce that the uncompleted portion will cost $30,000 per mile. I care not who builds it so that it be built. In the last Congress I introduced a bill relating to this matter, which had it become a law would have resulted either in the building of the road or the forfeiture of the land grant by the close of the present year.

In this Congress, recognizing that one section of the State immediately interested was restless on account of the non-completion of the road, the fact that a large section was tied up from settlement and development; the fact that the Chamber of Commerce of Astoria, an enterprising and progressive city, directly interested, memorialized Congress for a forfeiture; the fact that petitions for forfeiture were pouring in from citizens of my State along the line of road and elsewhere; the fact that the president of the company concerned had addressed a public letter to the Astoria Chamber of Commerce saying that his company "must abandon the project;" the fact that the Legislature of my State at its last session memorialized Congress to forfeit the grant for reasons stated in the memorial; the fact that no one whom I have the honor to represent has ever expressed to me a wish to the contrary, I concluded to favor a forfeiture of the unearned part. It was with reluctance, however, that I felt that such must be the case—that aid to our development should be withdrawn. I had hoped that the road would be built, and I was loath, as the only Representative of the three hundred and twenty-five members on this floor directly interested, to raise my voice and vote for a forfeiture; for I could not but feel that if we could not secure a road with the aid of a land grant, we could not readily expect one without it. However, some of our best citizens directly interested think otherwise. It is claimed by them, and also by the Committee on Public Lands, that if this grant is out of the way some other company will build the road. I hope so; that is all I can say. I tell you the man who gets up here on the floor and says that the road is to be built without any aid knows a great deal more about the situation than I do, who have lived there for thirty years. I hope, however, that he may be right.

Mr. PAYSON. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAYSON. Does the gentleman not know from the names of citizens I have given him while this matter was pending that prominent citizens of Astoria whom he indorses as truthful men make the statement to me which I have made in this House?

Mr. GEORGE. I have already stated in my remarks that estimable and enterprising citizens of my own State believe that if this grant was out of the way the road would be built, and I have said that I only hoped that they were correct in their faith; that is all. I know they are worthy and well-meaning, and generally know what they are about.

Mr. RAY, of New York. I desire to ask the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. GEORGE] a question, in order if possible to remove a doubt that exists in my own mind. Is it not to be presumed that when the Government made this grant it did so for the purpose of encouraging the building of this entire line of road in order to open up all this country?

Mr. GEORGE. I think it is presumable that Congress meant exactly what it said in this grant and in every other similar grant. It proposed that the land should be dedicated to the completion of the entire road; but it also provided for cutting the road up into continuous and contiguous sections, and that as fast as sections of twenty miles had been built the road should be considered to have earned and should receive the land conterminous with such sections so built.

Mr. RAY, of New York. One other question, if the gentleman will permit me?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. RAY, of New York. If you allow the grant to be cut up into sections in that way——

Mr. GEORGE. That is what the statute says.

Mr. RAY, of New York. If it is an entire contract and an entire grant I would ask the gentleman if cutting it up into sections in that way and giving the benefit of the grant to the company for the several sections of the road so constructed would not result in the end in a fraud upon the Government by allowing the company to build such sections of the road as it pleased through the rich portions of the grant, perhaps, and taking therefor the rich and valuable lands and leaving unearned the poor and the worthless lands?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know that I caught the exact purport of the question, but if there is anything in the suggestion of the gentleman it is against the passage of the original act, a matter which at the present time has passed out of our control. As to the value of lands earned I shall explain further on.

Mr. NICHOLLS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. NICHOLLS. I only desire to know who are the attorneys here of this railroad company.

Mr. GEORGE. So far as that is concerned I have no special information. It is well known by the committee that a gentleman distinguished in my State appeared before that committee in behalf of a number of these roads, including this one. I need not give names on this floor.

Mr. NICHOLLS. The gentleman from Oregon does not himself represent this road?

Mr. GEORGE. I disclaim any idea or intention of representing this or any other company. I have never in my life been employed by a railroad company. I would suffer my right arm to be cut off before I would, as a representative of the people, accept a fee or a promise of a fee, directly or indirectly, from a corporation or anybody else concerning a matter that was to come before me in my representative capacity as a member of this House. [Applause.]

I was going on to say when interrupted that I was anxious in opening this land to settlement to retain some of the substantial benefits of the Congressional aid toward the development of our fair young State, and on receiving a bill prepared by the Astoria Chamber of Commerce, providing for the forfeiture of the unearned part of the grant, as several other bills to like effect had already been introduced by others, I introduced it with an amendment taken from my bill in the Forty-seventh Congress, providing for the rights of settlers on forfeited lands, and with an amendment providing for the retention in the Treasury of the United States of all moneys collected by the United States during the next ten years for lands within the granted limits, to be paid over during that time to the first company completing the road. It did not provide that the lands should be sold at any prescribed price, but left them open to the land laws, and therefore the proceeds would have been such moneys as might have been paid in on pre-emption claims, timber claims, and coal lands, but much of the land would go as homesteads, thus probably not insuring much of a fund, yet I believe it to be just and right, injuring no one, while promoting the public welfare. But our committee having charge of such matters have ignored this provision and in fact ignored our bill and have made the forfeiture absolute. They not only forfeit the part unearned, as contemplated by the bill of the Astoria Chamber of Commerce, but they entirely forfeit even the earned portion. This part of the bill I can not indorse, and I will not vote for it. The lands along the line of the completed part were, I believe, fairly and legally earned. I do not propose to argue the legal proposition involved, but I have, however, my decided convictions on the points applicable, and I feel it would be wrong to attempt to divest the company of its earned lands.

The committee reporting this bill contend that this grant is an entirety, and every mile must be built before any land could be earned.

I differ entirely from this view, and while I shall not argue the law point, I will briefly call attention to the provisions of the bill. Every one admits that this was a grant in presenti on condition subsequent. It was a grant liable to be defeated in case the conditions were not performed. What were the conditions? I quote from the grant—

> The foregoing grant is upon the condition that said company shall complete a section of twenty miles or more within two years.

Again—

> That whenever and as often as the said company shall complete and equip twenty or more consecutive miles, the Secretary of the Interior shall cause the same to be examined at the expense of the company, * * * and if such section * * * is properly equipped and ready for use, he shall cause patents to be issued to the company for so much of the said granted lands as shall be adjacent to and conterminous with the said completed sections.

Now, under that grant, on building forty-seven and one-half miles within the six years and nearly all within the two years, what legal right have we to forfeit the lands along conterminous to the forty-seven and one-half miles of completed road?

Mr. RYAN. Why was not that done? Why were patents not issued?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know whether the company has applied for patents or has received them, I do not understand that they have ever been refused.

The legal minds on the committee claim that Congress has a right to forfeit these earned lands, and the question then arises whether we should.

I know that the Holman resolutions, a mixture of grains with much chaff concealed and apparent—which passed this House almost unanimously, aside from objectionable features which meant a repeal instead of amendment of the desert-land act, timber-culture act, timber act for Oregon, Washington, California, and Nevada, as well as the preemption act, in compliance with public clamor in the East, said that every acre of land subject to forfeiture in every land grant ever made ought to be forfeited without any examination or investigation and irrespective of all equities, yet I thought then as I now think that they were hastily considered, entirely too sweeping as well as useless; for the resolutions forfeited nothing, being merely a bombastic declaration; for every case must necessarily be considered on its merits when it arises. I believed then as I now believe that it would be unjust to take advantage of mere technicalities, in entire disregard of all equities.

I thought then as I now think that the deliberations of fifty other committees were and are entitled to some consideration as well as the Committee on Public Lands, especially when it made such work as it has with this bill. I thought then that it was inexpedient to bind the House to consider bills such as this committee might formulate, repealing our land laws of the West, in preference to bills in the interest of the revival of American shipping, commerce, judiciary, banking, currency, agriculture, foreign affairs, military and naval affairs, Indian, Territorial, and pension affairs, Mexican pension bills, and every other bill of interest to any section. I saw no reason why they should all clear the track in order that the Committee on Public Lands, constituted as it is, could report any scheme affecting our western lands or land grants.

By my vote on these resolutions, as I understood them, I reserved to myself the right and privilege of passing upon all the forfeiture bills according to the dictates of my own judgment as they arose. I have always been willing to afford every aid to amend existing defects in land laws that frauds might be prevented or punished or to forfeit all railroad land grants that should be forfeited. I have so voted this session and shall continue to so vote. And when I think, as in the present case, that lands are being forfeited that should not, I shall vote as I believe to be just and right, I care not what the consequences may be.

The committee claim that having the power to forfeit, while it does not follow that the power ought to be exercised, yet that in their judgment this is a case that would justify a forfeiture. The reason assigned is extraordinary. The report of the committee falsely assumes that the road constructed was not on the line contemplated by Congress. This surely is news in Oregon. And the committee speaks of "branch" and "main lines," words which do not occur in the act at all.

The title of the act says a "road from Portland to Astoria and McMinnville;" that is, a road from Portland to Astoria and a road from Portland to McMinnville. In the body of the act it defines the route more definitely, saying, "a road from Portland to Astoria, and from a suitable point of junction near Forest Grove to the Yamhill River, near McMinnville." To build this road required a common or main line running west from Portland to Forest Grove, over twenty miles, and from there north about ninety-seven miles to Astoria, and south about twenty-seven miles to McMinnville. Now, because the company only built the common line west from Portland, over twenty miles, and then the southern extension from there to McMinnville, and have used the completed portion with an extension farther on up the valley from McMinnville, built without land-grant aid, therefore, in the judgment of the committee, the company should be punished by forfeiting all the land they earned under the act. In other words, we should forfeit the lands earned for the same reason that we can forfeit them, namely, because the company did not build all of the road. This is the plain English of it. No one regrets more than myself that the whole of this road was not built, but how any one can claim this as a justification for tearing up what was done I am at a loss to understand.

Mr. Speaker, I know that corporate power has hitherto been swollen by State and national legislation to questionable extent, and while I would favor to any fair degree legislation looking to limitations, yet in our haste to do something let us not be unjust. We must not forget that the objectionable feature of this bill is a question of interference with vested interests where corporation property rights are but the aggregation of individual property rights. This great and good Government is too great, too good, too powerful to afford to do wrong. We must not forget that property rights must be respected and justice and equity accorded.

There is another objectionable feature in the bill as reported. The original act gave the railroad company a right of way through the public lands, with necessary lands for depots, stations, side-tracks, &c., but this bill proposes to forfeit and repeal "all rights, titles, and privileges" granted by the original act, and that these lands shall be subject to sale, &c., thus in effect selling out the very road-bed used by a road constructed in good faith within the time prescribed by the act. Can anybody claim that this is just? If you pass this bill as reported it will make an old-established road, built years ago and within the time of the act, a trespasser upon the public lands traveled over. This is the language of the grant, and the bill before us forfeits all rights under the original act:

> The right of way through the public lands of the width of one hundred feet on each side of said road, and the right to take from the adjacent public lands materials for constructing said road, and also the necessary lands for depots, stations, side-tracks, and other needful uses in operating the road, not exceeding forty acres at any one place.

Let me point out another defect. It has been stated on this floor that the bill proposes to protect actual settlers. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, it does nothing of the kind. It proposes, on the contrary, to protect every speculator who has purchased lands from the company, even to tracts of any size. Every speculator has his purchase confirmed, it matters not how many acres he may have attempted to gobble up; but the bill does not contain a single word in behalf of actual settlers who do not happen to be purchasers from the company. It does not even mention settlers. These settlers who in perfect good faith, believing that as the time for earning the lands had expired and that the company's right was really forfeited, and from that cause have settled upon odd sections, erecting homes, clearing and improving the lands, and residing thereon, possibly ever since 1876, the date of the expiration of the act, are, I submit, entitled to full and fair consideration. At least they are entitled to as much consideration as the bill gives to the land speculator who purchased from the company.

Not one of this class of honest, industrious, hard-working, bona fide settlers is protected by this bill. I shall propose an amendment that will protect them. As I have said, they have no privity of title with the company whatever.

Mr. PAYSON. Will the gentleman yield for one other question?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. PAYSON. Does the gentleman assert that there are no persons who as settlers have purchased land from the railroad company in quantities of one hundred and sixty acres each?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know for certain. Probably there may be a number of persons who are also settlers who have purchased one hundred and sixty acres each.

Mr. PAYSON. Was the gentleman present when ex-Senator Mitchell argued this question before the committee?

Mr. GEORGE. I was, a portion of the time.

Mr. PAYSON. Does not the gentleman know ex-Senator Mitchell made the statement that there were hundreds, not to say thousands, of settlers along the Willamette and Columbia River Valley who had purchased land in quantities of one hundred and sixty acres each and who should be protected?

Mr. GEORGE. I have no recollection of such an astonishing statement as that.

Mr. PAYSON. Will the gentleman say, as a Representative from the State of Oregon, that he believes it is not true?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not think there are anything like that number of such settlers.

Now, I say we ought to fix a limit of one hundred and sixty acres, or some other number at any rate, instead of confirming unlimited sales of lands to any and every body. I have an amendment prepared which I propose to submit in order to perfect the bill in this particular.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that I may not be misunderstood or misrepresented in this matter, I will again state that if this House will amend this bill so as to forfeit the unearned part of the grant merely, affording a reasonable protection to settlers or actual individual purchasers along the line, I shall record my vote in its favor, and therefore I shall at the proper time submit amendments for consideration with a view of thus perfecting the bill. As it stands it surely needs amendment. Aside from the objectionable features I refer to, it will, if passed, do what no one desires, not even the most ardent forfeiture advocate, and I shall propose an amendment to remedy that glaring defect also. The bill not only proposes to be unjust to the original company by forfeiting all its earned lands of forty-seven and one-half miles, reaching from Portland to McMinnville, but it is grossly negligent and careless in the clause proposing to confirm any and all lands that have been conveyed by the original company. It says that in case any of the lands to which the original company (the Oregon Central) or its successor would have been entitled had the road been constructed fully to Astoria have been sold by either the Oregon Central or its successor prior to January 1, 1884, the party or person so purchasing shall have the right to the lands so purchased, and upon proof of purchase and by paying any balance due the company to the United States patents shall issue to such parties. Did you ever see anything more loose or outrageous? Every acre of this land, earned and unearned, has been sold by the Oregon Central and paid for. It was first sold to the Oregon and California Railroad Company—a fact well known by the committee—and the Oregon and California, as its successor, has sold the whole by mortgage conveyance. In the inconsiderate haste to unjustly forfeit earned lands a bill is proposed which on its face carelessly confirms the whole grant without the building another foot of the road.

A pretty mess this is! A bill tearing up a constructed road, forfeiting its right of way and earned lands along the constructed line, and then confirming all unearned lands without building another mile; a bill attempting to forfeit what it ought not to forfeit, and confirming what it ought not to confirm; a bill forfeiting all title on the part of the Oregon Central and confirming everything earned and unearned to its assigns or to the assigns of the Oregon and California! Instead of loosening the hold of the corporation upon the lands, it binds the whole grant in chains beyond all remedy. I know it was not intentional upon the part of the honorable committee to have the language so loose and subject to such a construction, but that does not alter the fact that it is, and that a most fatal mistake has been made.

I undertake to say that the amendment at the close of this bill does what no member of the committee ever intended to do and what no member of this House will ever support. Now I appeal to this House to pause before it is too late, before it enacts this hasty and inconsiderate bill into a law. Let us take this bill up and carefully consider it and amend it and make it just, free it from careless and fatal mistakes, and make it at least a fair forfeiture bill and not a bill confirming title.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman has called attention to the third section of the original act, which provides that the company, as each twenty miles of the road are completed and accepted, shall be entitled to patents for the lands on either side of the track. Now, can the gentleman from Oregon explain for what reason the Secretary of the Interior refused to issue those patents?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know whether the Secretary of the Interior has issued the patents or refused to issue them. That is a matter between the company and the Secretary of the Interior, and I have no knowledge of it whatever. I know nothing about the private business of the company.

Mr. RAY, of New York. If the gentleman pleases, I should like to ask him a question: If that be true that all this land was sold prior to that time, why do you need to object to this bill? This simply would be an act confirming the title of the present owners, nothing more or less.

Mr. GEORGE. Because this bill proposes to confirm the unearned part without requiring any more road to be built. Besides, the first general conveyance was to another corporation and conveyed everything, and the report of the committee so states; there can be no doubt about that. I suppose from the language of their report they never intended to confirm what their act confirms; I have too much faith in the honor and integrity of the members of that committee to suppose they ever intended the bill should have the effect these words convey.

Now, this can all be amended; it can all be perfected by amending the bill so as to forfeit the unearned part and preserve to the company the part which they have earned. I have five amendments which I have prepared and which I shall offer to this bill. The first amendment will correct the evil of the bill forfeiting the road-bed and right of way. The second and third will prevent unjust forfeiture. The fourth and fifth amendments will protect the actual settlers along that line who have not been purchasers from the company, but have settled there without any title on their part, believing the land was forfeited. It will limit purchasers to one hundred and sixty acres. That is fair, right, and proper, and this House will assuredly indorse it. Then I propose to amend the closing part so as to remedy the defect of giving this unearned land to the company as the language of the bill proposes. Then the bill will simply be one confirming to the company the lands they have earned and protecting the rights of innocent purchasers and settlers along the unearned part, throwing the rest of the unearned lands open to the public domain. Is not that fair and right?

I will yield with pleasure to any gentleman who desires to ask me a question.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to ask a question which perhaps I should have asked of the gentleman in charge of the bill, but not having done it I will now call the attention of the gentleman from Oregon to this language contained in lines 23, 24, and 25:

Provided, That all unpaid purchase-money on such sales shall be paid to the United States, through the receiver of public moneys, at the proper land office.

I suppose from that language the land has been sold on time and that some payments for which notes or bonds have been given have not matured, but will mature after the passage of this act. The first question is whether this does not violate a clause of the Constitution which prohibits impairment of obligations of contracts already made. If these bonds and papers are out making promises to pay, and in no ignorance of the fact, but simply as a question of law between two parties, I would ask whether it is enough to defend that on the ground of failure of consideration, and whether in any event the parties owning the lands, the farmers, would not be subjected to a good deal of expensive litigation, especially in cases where the bonds or notes have passed into the possession of other parties?

I should like to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] having charge of this bill to that fact.

Mr. GEORGE. As I said before the affairs of this company with their assignees outside of matters of general notoriety are unknown to me. The legal points involved in the question have not been fully discussed by me.

I simply regard this grant, I repeat, as I believe every lawyer on this floor or elsewhere must, as a grant in presenti, a grant made with graduated conditions subsequent, and the graded conditions having been performed and the grant having to that extent been in part earned, the lands subject to the unperformed conditions only are open to the action of Congress. If we undertake to go further our action will be or ought to be void.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. If the Government agreed to convey to this railroad company a given quantity of land for building a given number of miles of railroad, and this company has constructed two-thirds of the railroad, which the company could construct for $20,000 per mile, and if they refused to construct the other third part of the road, which would cost them $40,000 a mile, I desire to ask whether it would not be equitable and fair to prorate the land; in other words, to give them lands pro rata for the value of the railroad that they have built in proportion to the expense of its construction? Would not that be fairer than to give them the whole or rather to give them two-thirds of the land for building two-thirds of the railroad, when they by their own volition assumed only to build that part that they could construct for one-half of the money which the other would cost?

Mr. GEORGE. I think the gentleman misunderstands me and misunderstands the purport of the bill.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I understood you to say that the road yet to be built would cost some $40,000 a mile, that it crosses two ranges of mountains, and would be an expensive line to construct in comparison with the portion already built.

Mr. GEORGE. The gentleman quite misunderstood me. I said I thought Mr. Villard's estimates were about $30,000. It crosses two elevations of hills or mountains, it is true, but they are rather low. The other portion of the road was also a difficult road to construct, although not quite so much so. But my proposition is simply to let the land alone which they have earned along the completed part of the road and allow the unearned lands to go, as desired by the people there.

Mr. HISCOCK. May I ask the gentleman a question? Do I understand the gentleman from Oregon to hold that the land on the line from Forest Grove to Astoria is substantially undisposed of except to this one company?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not so wish to be understood. There are purchasers from the company along the line, and there are actual settlers, who believed it was forfeited to the Government and have no privity of title from the company.

Mr. HISCOCK. Does the gentleman from Oregon know the amount of land covered by the contract made by the original parties to this grant and the Oregon and California company?

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, that includes the whole grant; that includes all franchises and everything.

Mr. HISCOCK. Do you know the terms of the contract which is saved by this report?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not, sir; it simply transferred the whole line, and is recognized by the report of the committee in this case.

Mr. HISCOCK. The validity of that transfer or contract is recognized?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HISCOCK. In other words, the rights of the grantees are recognized.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAYSON. I hope the gentleman will answer for himself, and not the committee, upon that point.

Mr. HISCOCK. Does the gentleman from Illinois claim that the rights of the grantees are not reserved by the bill?

Mr. PAYSON. I do. That is precisely what I claim. I will when I take the floor again, I think, show that to the satisfaction of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HOLMAN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman state if he has ascertained the reason why the patents were not issued upon the forty-seven miles of road which were built within the terms of the law and within the meaning of the third section of that act? I wish to know how it happens that the Secretary of the Interior did not authorize the issuing of the patents for the amount of land alleged to have been earned; and I wish to ask my friend if this does not arise under the last section of this act, which is substantially in these words: That the foregoing grant is upon condition that the said company shall complete a section of twenty miles of said railroad or telegraph within two years and the entire line within six years? Is not this interpretation placed upon that, that inasmuch as no patents were issued under the third section of the act the whole period of time had expired; the Secretary holding that under the provisions of this last section the contract between the corporation and the Government was invalidated, and having failed, he declined to issue any patents?

Mr. GEORGE. In the first place, I did not state that the Secretary of the Interior had ever refused to issue a patent. I do not know whether that is the case. I suppose, if such is the case, that it was for some other reason, because this same language is employed in a number of other grants where the patents have been issued regularly to the companies for lands along the line where they have completed the road.

Mr. HOLMAN. But have any patents ever been issued to this company for these lands?

Mr. GEORGE. Let me ask the gentleman, do you understand or do you know as a matter of fact whether the Secretary of the Interior has ever refused to patent an acre of this land along the forty-seven and one-half miles?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have understood he has declined to issue a patent.
Mr. GEORGE. But you do not know it from your own knowledge?
Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir; not from my own knowledge.
Mr. GEORGE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] if he knows as a matter of fact that the Secretary of the Interior has refused to issue patents for this land?
Mr. PAYSON. I am told by the chief clerk of the railroad division in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office that they have refused to issue patents on application made for the reason that this road was not completed within the time, and the additional reason that the matter was pending before Congress. Mr. Smith, the chief clerk of the railroad division of the General Land Office, is my authority for that statement.
Mr. GEORGE. When was this refusal made?
Mr. PAYSON. I do not know as to the date.
Mr. GEORGE. With all due deference to the gentleman from Illinois, I must state that I do not believe the Secretary of the Interior has ever made such a refusal; I may, however, be mistaken. I can not believe it unless the gentleman states upon his own knowledge that he knows that it is so. I think he surely has misunderstood Mr. Smith. However, that is immaterial.
Mr. PAYSON. The chief clerk of the railroad division of that office told me what I have stated.
Mr. GEORGE. I do not know whether this company ever made application for these patents. I think the company probably acted upon the theory that these lands are granted by the act and the patent is only evidence of title, and it is not necessary for them to apply for patents. A portion of these lands were within another railroad grant, namely, the Oregon and California Railroad. This grant earned was not a very valuable one. In addition to being an overlapped grant, as stated, it was through an old settled section, and much of the lands were already taken up along the line before the grant to the company. Consequently it has not been a matter of such great financial interest to them. The indemnity limits, extending only a few miles farther out being also in a settled portion, added but little to the grant in value.
Mr. HENLEY. They did not apply for the patents because they did not want them.
A MEMBER. To avoid paying taxes.
Mr. BELFORD. I desire to state that one of the reasons that existed for the refusal of patents to this road or any other was the newspaper clamor that occurred in this country last winter; and the Secretary of the Interior, with whom I have been intimately acquainted for thirteen years, desired to submit the whole subject to this House; and if he has not issued the patents, it was because he desired to secure primarily the judgment of this body on that subject. On that my friend from Oregon can rely.
Mr. GEORGE. This much I do know of my own personal knowledge, and I have it also from the Interior Department, that the first twenty miles and over were built within the first two years of the grant, as required by the act and accepted by the Interior Department and the President of the United States; and I do know further that the other twenty-seven miles were built within the six years, most of it within the first two years, and that it was passed upon by the Interior Department and by the President of the United States and accepted, every mile of it—that I do know—and all built within the time fixed by the act.
Mr. REAGAN. I suppose the gentleman does not mean by that statement to be understood as saying that the condition of the closing section of that act has been complied with?
Mr. GEORGE. That the company has not built the entire road is a matter of public notoriety that is not disputed here. And there are a number of other roads in the United States where they have not built the entire road; and it has never been urged by any one that I know of that you should forfeit the earned part of a grant simply because the company had not earned the rest of it.
Mr. HOLMES. Will the gentleman from Oregon permit me to ask him how many acres in the aggregate have been sold by the company to settlers which are validated by this bill?
Mr. GEORGE. That is another part of the private business between the company and the settlers which I can not answer, because I do not know. But I can say this: that every acre, earned or unearned, has been conveyed by the Oregon Central Company to the Oregon and California Company, and this bill confirms that conveyance.
Mr. HORR. If the gentleman will permit me, I wish to say there seems a good deal of question as to the issuance of these patents. I understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] to admit that whether they were issued or not had not anything to do with the real title.
Mr. PAYSON. The gentleman understood me correctly.
Mr. GEORGE. That is correct as a matter of law.
Mr. VALENTINE. Have any parties paid taxes on these lands?
Mr. GEORGE. I do not know whether they have or not.
I shall take pleasure, Mr. Speaker, so far as possible in answering any further question that may be addressed to me in regard to this matter.
Mr. RAY, of New York. I desire to ask one question, if the gentleman pleases. Will you state the character of the country through which the road has been constructed and the character of the country through which it has not been constructed?
Mr. GEORGE. I will, with pleasure. This whole sheet of paper [holding up a sheet on which was outlined the road in question] will represent generally a timbered country, much of it broken and quite hilly. This constructed portion of the road [indicating] runs over the hills back of Portland and through gaps in and along the valleys, but the country is pretty much covered with timber, except a portion of some of the valleys. The other portion of the country is much covered with timber and underbrush, and is broken, except where there are occasional settlements and a small prairie.
Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Regarding the completion of the road, so far as it has been completed, as a substantial part of the thing which Congress wished to have done, I would like to have the gentleman explain the commercial or other industrial relations between the different points.
Mr. GEORGE. I will try to. Portland is at the head of ship navigation, about one hundred and twenty miles from the ocean. [Referring to the sketch on the paper.] This will represent the ocean, this the Columbia River, and this the Willamette Valley. The grant was proposed to aid in the construction of a road from Portland to Astoria and McMinnville, Astoria lying to the north and McMinnville to the south. So far as the road has been built it is a part of the plan proposed by Congress to be carried out. When the balance of the road is completed, then Astoria will have the benefit of every mile of road already built under the act.
Mr. HORR. Has the gentleman any way of knowing how much per mile that portion of the road cost which has been built?
Mr. GEORGE. I do not know. Probably not quite so much per mile as the uncompleted portion would cost.
Mr. PAYSON. I did not exactly understand the last portion of the statement of the gentleman. Will he be kind enough to repeat it as to the relative difficulty of building this road?
Mr. GEORGE. I say that it was not as difficult or expensive to build that portion of the road completed, from Portland to McMinnville, as it would be the portion from Forest Grove to Astoria.
Mr. HORR. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the portion which has been constructed is the easier part to build?
Mr. GEORGE. I suppose it is easier than the part which has not been constructed, but the difference I do not know.
Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. And the unearned portion of the grant is not so valuable as the land lying along the finished portion of the road?
Mr. GEORGE. That possibly is true to some extent, but so much of the land had been taken up by actual settlers along the portion of the road which has been built and by the prior grant to the Oregon and California Company, that it did not leave much land for the Oregon Central Company.
I would ask how much time I have remaining?
The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes of his time remaining.
Mr. GEORGE. I have promised to yield a portion of my time to some gentleman.
Mr. HORR. You had better reserve what little time you have left.
Mr. GEORGE. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL].
Mr. ROWELL. I think the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. GEORGE] had better retain his time. Five minutes is not enough time in which to make any speech upon this question.
I desire only to say that while I believe the original policy of granting land in aid of the construction of railroads was a good policy, while I believe it has opened up a great empire to settlement and has brought thousands of farms within the reach of settlers, yet I believe the time has now come when Congress should declare forfeited all unearned land grants. I am therefore heartily in favor of every bill before this House forfeiting all land grants heretofore made and now unearned by the companies.
But in swinging away from one policy to another, when the time has come to adopt another, we are apt to go to such extremes as to destroy the thing we attempt and intend to do. I seriously doubt if this bill passes whether it will not open up a series of lawsuits that will be a blight upon the settlement of this country for years to come. I seriously doubt whether in a court of equity a bill that does not provide that time shall be of the essence can be enforced, and these lands, earned and unearned, can be forfeited to the Government under such a bill.
I know the theory that forfeitures are indivisible. But in regard to a grant which provides that land should be earned as fast as sections of twenty miles of road had been built, I seriously doubt whether a bill that does not provide for a strict forfeiture of the grant in the case of a road which has proceeded to build sections of twenty miles that have been accepted by the Government can be held to be effective so as to operate as a sweeping forfeiture by which every acre of land in the grant, both earned and unearned by the company, can be saved to the people who shall hereafter purchase lands of the United States along the line of the road. I doubt very much whether under such a bill settlers can obtain titles which will be sustained in the courts.

In this case, here is one hundred miles of land grant which in the interest of justice and equity we may forfeit without any question that the courts will sustain it. But if we pass this bill and declare forfeited also the earned lands along the forty-seven miles of the road which have been built, it may give rise to lawsuits in the courts and introduce an element into this case that there is no need of and which is not required by any demands of justice or equity.

I do hope that we shall pause and do what we ought to do, so that we may pass every one of these forfeiture bills in such a shape as to protect the interests of the United States and of actual settlers and not introduce an element of hesitation and doubt, promotive of future litigation.

Mr. HENLEY. The railroad companies threaten to litigate in any event.

Mr. ROWELL. I do not refer to litigation by the railroad companies, but by other parties who may be interested in these lands.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, if I had the time I should be glad to yield to several other gentlemen; but I have not. I desire now to present my amendments to the House for consideration. Am I in order, Mr. Speaker, in presenting them at this time?

Mr. PAYSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I have no objection to the amendments proposed by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. GEORGE] being voted upon. But I wish to know whether those amendments can be presented now and be considered as pending when the previous question is moved?

The SPEAKER. They can, if the gentleman does not object.

Mr. PAYSON. I have no objection to the gentleman offering the two amendments about which he has spoken to me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon will send up his amendments.

Mr. PAYSON. I desire to be recognized.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has thirty minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. PAYSON. Let the gentleman from Oregon send up his amendments.

Mr. GEORGE. I would like to submit five amendments to the bill and a substitute,

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. PAYSON. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not mean to decide that it would not be in order to offer an amendment and an amendment to the amendment; but five amendments and a substitute can not be presented at one time except by unanimous consent.

Mr. GEORGE. My substitute merely embodies the amendments I desire to propose.

Mr. PAYSON. Let us understand, Mr. Speaker, whether the gentleman proposes to offer his amendments or his substitute.

Mr. GEORGE. The amendments and also the substitute.

Mr. PAYSON. The substitute I object to.

Mr. GEORGE. Then I submit my amendments.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] consent to allow the gentleman from Oregon to offer five amendments?

Mr. PAYSON. I will consent to that.

Mr. BELFORD. If the amendments of the gentleman from Oregon are to cut off debate, I object.

The SPEAKER. The offering of the amendments will not cut off debate. The amendments will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "act," in line 9, insert the words "excepting the right of way, with necessary lands used in operating the road constructed."

Mr. PAYSON. That is almost the exact language of an amendment which I had intended to offer. I accept that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the other amendments sent up by the gentleman from Oregon.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "States," in line 13 of the printed bill:

"Provided, That this act shall not apply to any lands included in the grant aforesaid conterminous with that portion of the line of railroad and telegraph which was completed prior to May 4, 1876."

Amend the amendment of the committee by inserting after the word "grant," in the eighteenth line of the second page:

"And which lie conterminous with that portion of the line of railroad and telegraph line which was not completed prior to May 4, 1876."

Insert after "eighty-four," in line 20, these words:

"To actual settlers thereon, or to individuals other than actual settlers, in tracts not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres to each."

Mr. PAYSON. While I do not agree that the amendment just read is necessary, I am willing, in order to save all possible question, to accept it.

The SPEAKER. The House must vote upon the amendments. The Clerk will report the next amendment sent up by the gentleman from Oregon.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

"That in the case of all lands forfeited to the United States under the provisions of this act, all persons who at the date of the passage of this act, and who are otherwise qualified, are actual settlers in good faith on any such lands, on making claim to the same under the homestead, pre-emption, or other laws within six months after the same shall have been declared forfeited, shall be entitled to a preference right to enter the same in accordance with the provisions of this act, and of the homestead, pre-emption, or other laws, as the case may be, and shall be regarded as having legally settled upon and occupied said lands under said pre-emption, homestead, or other laws, as the case may be, from the date of such actual settlement or occupation. And in case any such settler may not be entitled to thus enter or acquire such land under the existing laws, they shall be permitted, within one year after the passage of this act, to purchase not to exceed one hundred and sixty acres of the same at the price of $1.25 per acre; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to make such rules and regulations as will secure to said actual settlers the benefit of these rights."

Mr. PAYSON. I will say for the information of the House——

Mr. BRENTS rose.

Mr. PAYSON. I decline to yield for the amendments which the gentleman from Washington Territory [Mr. BRENTS] desires to offer. I would be glad to oblige him; but I do not think I ought to yield.

Mr. BRENTS. I would like to have my amendments read for information.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] declines to yield.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope my friend from Illinois will yield to me a moment.

Mr. PAYSON. I agreed to allow the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to offer an amendment, to be considered as pending. I yield to him now.

Mr. HOLMAN. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 12 and 13 strike out the words "sale and settlement under existing laws of the United States" and in lieu thereof insert the words "settlement under the provisions of the homestead laws only."

Mr. PAYSON. I have promised to yield for three minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HENLEY] who is a member of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DUNN. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will permit me to offer an amendment.

Mr. PAYSON. I have not seen it, and do not know what it is; but I will not object to the amendment being read at the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. Amendments can only be offered by unanimous consent. There are more amendments pending now than can be allowed under the rules.

Mr. PAYSON. I am willing to allow the gentleman's amendment to be read at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. DUNN. I will send up my amendment and have the Clerk read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after and including the fifteenth line to and including the twenty-ninth line and insert the following:

"Provided, That in case any lands embraced within the terms of this act, to which the said railroad company or its sucessor would have been entitled had the said road been constructed as provided in the act making the grant, have been sold by either of said companies prior to December 1, 1883, the bona fide settlers or occupants who purchased and settled upon any of said lands shall have the prior right to purchase or homestead the same in the manner and to the extent allowed by existing laws of the United States."

Mr. BRENTS. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the following:

"In case any of the lands embraced within the terms of this act, to which the said railroad company or its successor would have been entitled had said road been constructed as provided in the act making the grant, have been sold by either of said companies prior to January 1, 1884, the party or person so purchasing any of said lands shall have the right to the lands so purchased upon making proof of the fact of such purchase at the local land office of the district where said land may be located: Provided, That all unpaid purchase-money on such sales shall be paid to the United States, through the receiver of public moneys at the proper land office; and upon proof as above, and payment of such unpaid balance, if any, within twelve months of the passage of this act, patents shall issue to the parties entitled thereto for the land."

And in lieu thereof insert:

Provided, That in case any of said lands lying conterminous with the constructed and accepted portion of said road were sold or contracted to be sold by either of said companies prior to January 1, 1884, the purchasers thereof, their heirs or assigns, upon making proof of such purchase and payment to such company of an amount equal or exceeding $1.25 per acre at the local land office, or on making payment to the receiver of public moneys for such land office of a sum which, added to the sum paid to such company, may amount to $1.25 per acre, shall be entitled to patents therefor from the United States.

Mr. COBB. I object to those amendments.

Mr. PAYSON. I will yield now to the gentleman from California for three minutes.

Mr. HENLEY. Mr. Speaker, an objection has been urged against this bill which seems to me to arise from some slight confusion of moral perception. It is held the Public Lands Committee in this bill has distinguished between the equities of the bondholders of this railroad and the actual settlers. I am frank to confess that is so. And why is it? There were two classes of parties whose alleged moral rights were involved in this bill: One class was of those who invested in these railroad securities predicated on this land grant; and the other, the ignorant, rude, uncultured, adventurous settlers, who, proceeding on the idea the railroad company were the owners or would be of these public lands, supposing in point of fact the railroad company had ample power to alienate and sell, went upon the lands and made their homes there. That is one character of individuals whose rights are affected by this bill, and the other was these investors in railroad securities. As to one class, and I hope the House will not be misled on that matter, as to the uncultured, the uneducated, the ignorant, and the poor settler; he has not the means, he has not the opportunities to consult competent legal authority for the purpose of informing himself as to his rights, and he went in good faith and made settlement on the lands of this railroad grant. But how is it with the capitalist? He has had at his disposal the best legal talent in the country, and he made this investment with his eyes open, knowing everything the settler was ignorant of. That is the distinction which the Committee on Public Lands drew in reference to this matter: that the capitalist must stand on the law as it is, but that as to the settler in good faith we give him the right to consummate his purchase, and so far as any amount may be due to the railroad corporation it can be paid to the Government and credited to him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Why do you not confine it to the settler?

Mr. HENLEY. We do.

Mr. GEORGE. No, it does not say settler.

Mr. PAYSON. I will now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES].

Mr. OATES. I would like to have fifteen minutes.

Mr. PAYSON. I only have seventeen minutes left.

The SPEAKER. Taking out the time occupied in reading amendments the gentleman has twenty-seven minutes left.

Mr. OATES. I ask to be recognized in my own time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Alabama that the gentleman from Illinois in charge of the bill has given notice that at the expiration of his time he will demand the previous question.

Mr. OATES. As a member of the committee I desire to be recognized in my own time.

The SPEAKER. Of course if the gentleman from Illinois demands the previous question and that is sustained the Chair will be unable to recognize the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. PAYSON. There seems to be a general feeling that this bill should be disposed of to-night, and, if so—— [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. OATES. I should like to be heard in my own right.

Mr. PAYSON. Then I will yield the floor and let the gentleman from Alabama be recognized in his own time. I give notice to the House that I will not move the previous question to-day; but will reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. OATES was recognized.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask the gentleman from Alabama to yield for a motion to adjourn.

Mr. OATES. I will yield the floor for that purpose, retaining my right to it when this question comes up again.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I hope the gentleman will withhold that motion for a moment. The other day the House passed a very important public measure, which has been amended by the Senate by the insertion of simply two words, a mere formal amendment. I desire, therefore, unanimous consent of the House to take this bill from the Speaker's table with a view to concurring in the Senate amendments. This is a bill to protect the people from certain persons who are fraudulently representing themselves as officers or agents of the General Government.

Mr. MILLS. That is right.

The SPEAKER. Unless the motion to adjourn is withdrawn the Chair must recognize it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will withdraw the motion.

FRAUDULENT ASSUMPTION OF DUTIES OF UNITED STATES OFFICERS.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I now ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for the purpose of concurring in the Senate amendments the bill (H. R. 4993) making it a felony for a person to falsely and fraudulently assume or pretend to be an officer or employé acting under the authority of the United States or any Department thereof, and prescribing the penalty therefor, for the purpose of concurring in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The amendments of the Senate will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 3, after the word "Department," insert the words "or any officer."

In line 6, after the word "Department," insert the words "or any officer."

Amend the title as follows: "Making it a felony for any person to falsely or fraudulently assume or pretend to be an officer or employé acting under the authority of the United States or any Department thereof, and prescribing a penalty therefor."

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the amendments of the Senate will be concurred in.

There was no objection.

DEFICIENCY, DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

Mr. RANDALL. I present a letter addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations by the Attorney-General in relation to deficiencies in that Department. I want to say that all such papers should come through the House and not directly to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I make this statement in order that Cabinet officers or heads of Departments may understand that we can only get jurisdiction of matters of that character through the action of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state in addition that Rule XLII requires that the estimates of appropriations and all other communications from the Executive Departments intended for the consideration of any of the committees of the House shall be addressed to the Speaker and by him submitted to the House for reference.

Mr. RANDALL. That is the rule, and it is the right way, and the only way the committee can have jurisdiction.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will lay before the House the communication from the Attorney-General to which the gentleman refers.

The SPEAKER accordingly laid before the House a letter from the Attorney-General, transmitting estimates of deficiencies on account of expenses of United States courts for the fiscal year 1884.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that the paper be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

There being no objection, the communication was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

GREELY RELIEF EXPEDITION.

Mr. RANDALL. I also ask that the Senate bill (No. 1871) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to offer a reward of $25,000 for the rescue of or ascertaining the position of the Greely expedition be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

There being no objection, the Senate bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read by its title a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

MESSENGER IN DOCUMENT-ROOM.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following letter from the Sergeant-at-Arms; which was read, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee on Rules, and ordered to be printed:

SERGEANT-AT-ARMS, UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, April 7, 1884.

SIR: I most respectfully call your attention to the inclosed report from the superintendent of the document-room. It will be seen that the young man is incapacitated for the duties required of him. Having been appointed by a resolution of the Senate, I request the further pleasure of your honorable body concerning the same.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. P. CANADAY,
Sergeant-at-Arms United States Senate.

To Hon. GEORGE F. EDMUNDS,
President Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a memorial signed by leading citizens, manufacturers of Lima, Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of certain House bills and also certain Senate bills which they represent are inimical to the interests of inventors and patentees. I also present a memorial somewhat similar in character from citizens of Dayton, Ohio. I move that the memorials be referred to the Committee on Patents.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom were referred certain amendments intended to be proposed to the bill (S. 1876) providing for an inspection of meats for transportation, prohibiting the importation of adulterated articles of food or drink, and authorizing the President to make proclamation in certain cases, and for other purposes, to report the same, and ask that the bill be reprinted with these amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be reprinted with the additional amendments now reported from the committee, if there be no objection.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1881) for the relief of W. H. Tibbits, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. 2004) for the relief of W. H. Tibbits; which was read twice by its title.

IRRIGATION IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 1,000 copies of Executive Document No. 290, first session Forty-third Congress, relating to irrigation of the San Joaquin, Tulare, and Sacramento Valleys, California.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MCMILLAN (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2005) to authorize the Court of Claims to investigate the claim of George F. Brott for logs used in the construction of Fort Abercrombie, Dakota Territory, and to give judgment for the same; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2006) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1882; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GEORGE introduced a bill (S. 2007) to extend the duration of the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. GEORGE. I introduce this bill by request. I wish to state that I do not indorse nor condemn the bill, for I have not read it. I move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON introduced a bill (S. 2008) to provide for the payment of the amounts that may be found to be due to postmasters under the act of March 3, 1883, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (S. 2009) granting a pension to Isabella Turner; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 2010) granting a pension to John S. Williams; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2011) granting a pension to Mary M. Lyon; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MANDERSON introduced a bill (S. 2012) for the relief of James Bainter; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2013) for the relief of George S. Comstock; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 2014) to amend section 4419 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and for the better protection of lives of passengers and others carried on steam vessels; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ABOLITION OF PRIZE-MONEY.

Mr. BECK. I submit the following resolution, and ask that it may be acted upon now, unless there is objection:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate whether in his opinion the efficiency of the Navy would be impaired by the repeal of all laws granting prize-money in any form to the officers and sailors of the Navy of the United States as now provided for by title 54 of the Revised Statutes, giving such reasons for or against a repeal of said provisions as he may think desirable for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BLAIR. If it should lead to any lengthy debate I should like to reserve the right to object.

Mr. BECK. I have not a word to say about it. The reason why I desire it is that we are now entering on the building of a new navy. A number of steel cruisers are already ordered, and the appropriation bill which will be before the Senate to-morrow provides for still others. They are not to be ships of war in the proper sense. The ships that will have to do the fighting will be the ironclads and others. I thought perhaps it would be well to ascertain whether it would not be wise to abolish prize-money.

Mr. BLAIR. It is simply a call for information, and if the Senator does not anticipate debate upon the resolution I shall not object to its consideration.

Mr. BECK. It is simply a call for information, to know what would be the effect upon the Navy if that were done, with a view of providing for it, unless there is shown good reason why it should not be done.

Mr. BLAIR. I have no objection, unless it should lead to protracted debate, in which case I reserve the right to object; that is all.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

CAMP DOUGLAS MILITARY RESERVATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolutions," that order is closed. The Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar under the eighth rule.

Mr. BLAIR. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will first state the question. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 398, known as the educational bill. Does he yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BLAIR. Yes, for a formal matter.

Mr. WILSON. When Senate bill 478 was reached under Rule VIII I objected to its consideration, and consequently it went over to be considered under Rule IX. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON] is anxious to have the bill restored to its place under Rule VIII. I have examined the report accompanying the bill since I made the objection, and I am content to withdraw it in order that the bill may be restored to its place on the Calendar.

Mr. PLUMB. What is the bill?

Mr. WILSON. It is the bill (S. 478) to authorize the Secretary of War to relinquish and turn over to the Interior Department certain parts of the Camp Douglas Military reservation, in the Territory of Utah.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks, pending the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire, unanimous consent that the bill indicated by him be placed at the head of the Calendar, under Rule VIII, as the Chair understands. Is there objection? If there be no objection, the bill will be at the head of the Calendar under Rule VIII.

CHARLES BREWSTER.

Mr. COCKRELL. Pending the consideration of the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire, I ask that Order of Business 413, being the bill (S. 651) to authorize the President to restore Charles Brewster to his former rank in the Army, which was reported adversely by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON], be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs. There is no objection to it. It is only a formal matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire, the Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the bill indicated by him be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs. If there be no objection that order will be entered.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the papers in relation to the case be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be recommitted, together with the accompanying papers.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 5261) making an appropriation for the Agricultural Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4993) making it a felony for a person to falsely and fraudulently assume or pretend to be an officer or employé acting under the authority of the United States or any Department thereof, and prescribing the penalty therefor.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the educational bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. HOAR, in section 1, line 3, to strike out "ten" before "years" and insert "eight;" so as to read:

That for eight years next after the passage of this act there shall be annually appropriated from the money in the Treasury the following sums, to wit.

And in line 5, after the words "to wit," to strike out:

The first year the sum of $15,000,000, the second year the sum of $14,000,000, the third year the sum of $13,000,000, and thereafter a sum diminished $1,000,000 yearly from the sum last appropriated, until ten annual appropriations shall have been made, when all appropriations under this act shall cease.

And insert in lieu thereof:

The first year the sum of $7,000,000, the second year the sum of $10,000,000, the third year the sum of $15,000,000, the fourth year the sum of $13,000,000, the fifth year the sum of $11,000,000, the sixth year the sum of $9,000,000, the seventh year the sum of $7,000,000, the eighth year the sum of $5,000,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN], the Chair believes, is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, during the learned and eloquent argument submitted by the honorable Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] on Friday and Saturday last, as I understand the argument he took strong ground against the constitutionality of the present bill, assuming the position that the States alone have the power and the right to educate the children of the respective States. To establish more conclusively this position he read from the constitutions of several of the States as they existed prior to the formation of the Constitution of the United States and subsequent to that period, assuming that the constitutional provisions that were contained in the constitutions of the respective States clearly contemplate the exclusion of Federal interference in the education of the people and the assumption and ability on the part of the States to discharge that task. The honorable Senator used the following language:

Mr. President, when the Senate adjourned yesterday I was submitting for its consideration something of the constitutional history of the States at the time and before and subsequent to the adoption of the Federal Constitution in respect of the measures which they took to foster and promote the education of the people. My purpose in that reference was to show that the several States of the Union had taken that subject entirely into their own charge; that they had provided amply for the education of the people through their respective constitutions, and that therefore the education of the people was a subject connected, it it true, intimately with the general welfare, but belonging to that part of the general welfare which was left purposely in charge of the States.

There the position is taken that the States by their constitutions have taken the subject entirely into their own charge, and provided amply for the education of the people.

Among other constitutions referred to was the constitution of my own State, which has always had a liberal provision in reference to the education of the people both in the primary branches and in the collegiate branches of education.

The Senator from Alabama, however, by some inadvertence passed over the constitution of his own State, which is itself very liberal on that question. I find in the constitution of Alabama, article 12, section 2, the following language:

The principal of all funds arising from the sale or other disposition of lands or other property which has been or may hereafter be granted or intrusted to this State, or given by the United States for educational purposes, shall be preserved inviolate and undiminished; and the income arising therefrom shall be faithfully applied to the specific objects of the original grants or appropriations.

That refers to lands and other property donated or given by the United States heretofore or hereafter. It seems, therefore, in making ample provision for the education of the people, that the State of Alabama doubtless, as the Senator says, considered it had done so, but as a part of that means it provided for the acceptance of donations of land or other property from the Government of the United States and for an inviolate good faith and proper disposition of the proceeds of the sales of the lands and other property.

I do not know exactly what other property was referred to unless it may have been in contemplation that money was property. I suppose it was not contemplated by the convention of the people of Alabama in forming the constitution of Alabama that the Government of the United States would donate not only lands, but the custom-house at Mobile, or some other property of that character, as the barracks wherever there may be any, for educational purposes. It intended to use "property" no doubt in its broadest sense, and include money or any other kind of property. There is the expressed provision in the constitution of Alabama as one of the means of educating the people for the care and protection of the proceeds of all donations heretofore made or hereafter to be made by the United States to the State of Alabama.

But this was not all. Since the adoption of this constitution of Alabama the honorable Senator himself has on more than one occasion introduced in the Senate a bill to donate forty-odd thousand acres of the public lands to Alabama to aid in rebuilding the University of Alabama. It seems, therefore, to be convenient to the people of Alabama to have a little assistance occasionally from the Government of the United States in carrying out their great educational system.

I recollect in the Forty-sixth Congress I voted, I think, with the honorable Senator from Alabama for a donation of land for the university of that State, and the bill passed this body. It did not probably get through the House of Representatives. I am not sure but we passed the same bill again at this session.

Mr. PUGH. The same bill.

Mr. BROWN. We had it before us, and I am right; it was passed. So that the Senator has persistently kept up his line of application to the United States Government for aid to rebuild the University of Alabama, and we have granted them forty-odd thousand acres of land so far as the Senate can grant it at this immediate session, to say nothing of our action at a previous session.

I think we did right. But still it seems that the State of Alabama is not conducting her educational affairs entirely under her own control and with her own means. As I have said, it is very convenient occasionally to have a little help from the Government of the United States; and her Senator has been vigilant in securing it.

In 1862 Congress passed an act known as the land-grant act, in which it made provision for the distribution of certain quantities of public land among the several States in aid of education of a particular character or particular characters. I want to refer to that act, or at least to a section of it, as I believe the State of Alabama availed herself of the benefit of that act. She certainly was entitled to it, and, if I recollect correctly, she took the benefit of it. That act contained a section that in making the donation to the States the Government did not do so without imposing terms and restrictions, but there were restrictions even in that act. The section I refer to reads as follows:

That all moneys derived from the sale of the lands aforesaid by the States to which the lands are apportioned, and from the sales of land-scrip hereinbefore provided for, shall be invested in stocks of the United States, or of the States, or some other safe stocks, yielding not less than 5 per cent. upon the par value of said stocks; and that the moneys so invested shall constitute a perpetual fund, the capital of which shall remain forever undiminished (except so far as may be provided in section 5 of this act), and the interest of which shall be inviolably appropriated, by each State which may take and claim the benefit of this act, to the endowment, support, and maintenance of at least one college where the leading object shall be, without excluding other scientific and classical studies, and including military tactics, to teach such branches of learning as are related to agriculture and the mechanic arts, in such manner as the Legislatures of the States may respectively prescribe, in order to promote the liberal and practical education of the industrial classes in the several pursuits and professions in life.

There is a provision, however, that it is to be done notwithstanding the restrictions that are put upon the use of the fund in such manner as the Legislatures of the States may prescribe. Probably all the States had prescribed the manner of disposing of this fund that endowed agricultural colleges with certain powers and with certain qualifications, and they had excluded females from some of those colleges. There was a grievance it was thought by some, and yet if the matter were left entirely in charge of the States, and no provision made by Congress on the subject, females were perpetually excluded, could not come in, could have no share in this fund. The question came up then very naturally whether Congress ought not further to interfere and regulate that matter notwithstanding this donation, and whether females ought not to have an equal participation in the fund; and there the honorable Senator from Alabama with commendable zeal, and in a good cause it was, too, came to the front. When the educational bill known as the Morrill bill was up in the Forty-sixth Congress for discussion the Senator offered the following amendment:

And said last-mentioned act of Congress is hereby amended so as to require each State and Territory to establish in said colleges schools for the instruction of females in such branches of technical education as are suitable to their sex.

That would look a little like an interference with the will of the State. This fund had been given to the State, having been raised by the sale of lands donated to the State, for certain educational purposes, which were prescribed in the act, and she had excluded females. With that action the Senator from Alabama was justly indignant, and he offers the amendment to the bill, he states, to admit females, for that is the purport of it, and, as I shall show by his argument, that was the object he had in view. I think it was a proper amendment, and I believe I voted with him for it, because I thought it ought to be incorporated. In discussing that question the honorable Senator said:

But the construction of the law placed upon it by the men who have in charge these institutions needs to be remedied and corrected, and that is the main purpose of my amendment.

The purpose was to remedy and correct the action of the State on this subject as to the use they would make of the fund.

Mr. MORGAN. The act of Congress, not the State—the act granting the donation to the schools.

Mr. BROWN. Well, we will see a little further on how that is:

My amendment—

Says the Senator—

My amendment, however, goes further than that; it reaches to that part of the education of the common people of this country at this day and time which is most requisite for their real preparation for the ordinary and compulsory duties of life. Of course a common-school education in the elementary branches of learning is not to be dispensed with; that is an indispensable basis of all technical education; but we are devoting ourselves, it seems to me, exclusively in this law either to the teaching of the mere elementary branches, to which women may be admitted, or when we pass beyond that, of teaching the technical branches of education only to men. The doubt and difficulty in which the construction of this statute involves the subject, it seems to me, ought to be removed by an act of Congress, and the amendment which I propose is directed precisely to that point. I desire to make it not only permissive in these schools to receive women for education, but to make it compulsory—

That is, the State has not disposed of this fund as she ought to have done, or she does not let the class come in that ought to come in, and the Senator proposed therefore to make it compulsory on the State schools to admit that class; or, in other words, compulsory on the State to admit that class into these schools—that they shall provide a school within this college somewhere or in some way by which the women of the land may be enabled to be taught branches of industry which will be useful to them in their maintenance and in the establishment of their independence as people.

That doctrine seemed a little strong to some of the Senators, and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] interrupted and said:

May I ask the Senator a question for information?
Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.
Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to know where we get the authority to change the terms upon which the States accepted these grants, which were complete in themselves at the time, and which were not continuing like this present bill, there being, so far as I saw when I looked at it just now, no provision that Congress reserved the right to change the provisions under which the States were to accept the donation?
Mr. MORGAN. We are making an additional donation, conferring an additional bounty on the State.
Mr. EDMUNDS. Not for the benefit of the agricultural colleges.
Mr. MORGAN. Oh, yes; they are expressly named here as receiving a large part of this.
Mr. EDMUNDS. As far as that would go, we could impose terms.
Mr. JONES, of Florida. Is not a portion of this fund to go to the existing agricultural colleges?
Mr. MORGAN. Expressly.
Mr. JONES, of Florida. One-third of it?
Mr. MORGAN. A very large proportion of it is to go to the agricultural colleges as they are now established, under this bill, and I suppose, of course, that in the appropriation of additional money to the agricultural colleges we have the right to introduce terms, and we can make it a condition, if we choose, that the States shall not have the benefit unless they adopt the terms.

Again the Senator from Alabama says:

There is scarcely a State in the Union that devotes any specific attention to this very matter, and it is time that the Congress of the United States had at least set the example to the States, and now that it has a favorable opportunity I hope that Congress will not fail to do so.

Congress then, it seems, had the constitutional power to set the example.

The Senator from Alabama proceeds:

It is very true that under ordinary circumstances the establishment and endowment of schools of technology requires a good deal of money, requires quite a variety of professors and instructors and tutors in various branches of industry which our people are following in the land, and it is equally true that the amount of money which is to be raised under this bill is comparatively a small one. Some Senators have expressed the hope and the confidence that this fund will hereafter be added to. I join very heartily in that hope and in that confidence, and that not only this fund will be increased by private contributions, but that hereafter we shall find other means arising from the general Treasury of the United States for the purpose of aiding in this very important movement, I think one of the most important movements which have ever addressed themselves to the civilization of the people of the United States.

There the Senator does not seem to have been drawing the fine-spun distinction, as it seems to me it is, between donating land and the proceeds of land or the land that belongs to the Government and the money that belongs to the Government, but he looks to the time when the fund will be added to not only by individual donations but from the general Treasury of the United States. That was not unconstitutional at that time according to the opinion of the Senator from Alabama.

I will send to the desk and ask the Secretary to read something further that I have marked.

The Secretary read as follows from the RECORD:

Mr. MORRILL. May I ask the Senator from Alabama if he does not believe this is a question that had better be left to the several States, when all but fourteen of these colleges have already admitted women to all their privileges, and the very institution that he has mentioned was established by the agricultural-college fund?
Mr. MORGAN. I should be entirely willing to do that; but we have been nearly twenty years conducting these colleges or some of them under this law, and yet, as I have remarked, there are only half of them—there is less than half of them—that admit women at all to the colleges. They are barred from going there by regulations of the institution, and in not more than three or four of all these colleges are there any special schools of instruction in reference to the common industries of life. The experiment has been a failure, if that was one of its purposes.
Mr. MORRILL. The Senator of course is aware that one great reason in the smaller States is that the fund has not been sufficient.
Mr. MORGAN. I think the fund ought to be sufficient for that purpose, before almost any other you could name, except to teach the elements of an English education. The fund has been quite sufficient to have in all these agricultural colleges boys decked out in military gear, with bands of music and drums, and drill officers sent there for the purpose of training them as soldiers. I do not know one, perhaps there are some, but I do not know one of these agricultural colleges which is not a regular barrack, a camp of soldiery, where the youths of the country are made to step about and strut about in uniforms, wearing swords and carrying guns—in my judgment a very useless waste of money.
Then, again, there are large numbers of professors in these colleges, quite an extraordinary number of them, far more than is necessary to teach the simple branches of education which are taught in these colleges. There is a great loss of money there. We leave it to the States, of course, but I am disposed to put some restriction upon the expenditure of this money hereafter, and I think that one class of people who are totally neglected and totally unprovided for ought to be provided for by an act of Congress, which shall require the State schools to admit women; I do not mean into the college proper on the basis of coeducation with boys, but I mean that they shall be admitted into schools prepared for them, and that the purposes of these schools shall be directed specifically to their education in the ordinary industries of life and in a great many technical pursuits where they can earn the means of subsistence.

Mr. BROWN. I find in the speech of the honorable Senator from Alabama delivered on Saturday last this language:

What I complain of is the exercise of the power by Congress in this bill to follow that fund after it has been donated and the power to call the States to the bar of the Senate, year after year, upon their reports for the judgment of this body and the other House upon their conduct.

I do not wish to see the proud State of Alabama arraigned at the bar of the Senate of the United States to answer how she has disposed of money, come from what source it may, in the discharge of a duty which she owes to her own citizenship.

The greatest trouble of the Senator in regard to the present bill is the interference with the States by calling them to the bar of the Senate and House of Representatives to make a showing as to how they have disposed of this property. It would seem from the remarks just read from the Senator from Alabama that he was finding a great deal of fault with the way the States had disposed of the agricultural college fund, and especially with the way the boys were rigged out in military uniform as if at a camp of instruction, and the fact that they had refused to permit females to participate and be educated in the colleges, and he was at that time for regulating that matter and putting in restrictions and conditions. It seem to me therefore that the position that the Senator took then is hardly reconcilable with the one that he takes now on this question. It is not important that it should be, because wise men change when they are satisfied they are wrong. I want to read a little further from the Senator's speech on this same question:

If this provision should have no other effect than merely to distribute information of that sort among the people of the United States at large, and particularly among the uneducated people of the section of country in which my friend from Georgia lives and in which I live, the accomplishment of that one result would be quite sufficient to justify us in making this requirement upon the States.

The language there is "requirement upon the States." Again:

I ask the Senate to adopt this amendment because I believe it will be the starting-point of a very great movement in this country. I believe that it can not possibly do any harm; that it does not in the slightest degree embarrass the bill, which has all of my sympathy and will have my support. I commit it to the candid attention of the Senate and ask for it their support.

Mr. President, these are rather strong expressions that I have read from the speech of the honorable Senator on the Morrill bill. I will summarize them a little, quoting the language of the Senator in only parts of the sentences. "No reason for despairing of success if we shall make it compulsory on the States to adopt a system of this kind;" "quite sufficient to justify us in making this requirement upon the States;" "I am disposed to put some restrictions upon the expenditure of this money hereafter;" "this class ought to be provided for by act of Congress, which shall require these schools to admit women; that the purpose of these schools shall be directed specifically to their education in the ordinary industries of life," &c. Again he says: "I join very heartily in that hope and in that confidence that not only this fund will be increased by private subscriptions but that hereafter we shall find other means arising from the general Treasury of the United States for the purpose of aiding in this very important movement—I think one of the most important movements which have ever addressed themselves to the civilization of the people of the United States." Again he says: "We have the right to introduce terms, and we can make a condition if we choose that the States shall not have the benefit unless they adopt the terms;" "I desire to make it not only permissive in these schools to receive the money for education, but to make it compulsory that they shall provide a school within this college somewhere or in some way by which the women of the land may be enabled to be taught branches of industry," &c.

These were the expressions used by the honorable Senator from Alabama in reference to the compulsory means and the terms to be adopted when the States had not carried out the trust in reference to the agricultural-college scrip as he thought ought to have been done. I find no fault with these utterances. I thought they were wise at the time. I voted with the Senator. He voted for the bill and so did I, and I still think Congress when it appropriates the money has the power he claimed for it in this very able speech.

It may be proper, however, that I should refer to the bill known as the Morrill bill and see what were its provisions in reference to the imposition of terms, reports, &c. I mean the bill that the Senator from Alabama and I voted for. There are two sections of the bill bearing on that subject that I send to the desk and ask to have read. One is on page 221 and the other is on page 227 of the same volume of the RECORD. It is in small print.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. On or before the 1st day of September in each year the Commissioner of Education, under direction of the Secretary of the Interior, shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury as to each State, Territory, and district, whether it is entitled to receive its share of the apportionment under this act, and the amount of such share, which shall thereupon be entitled to receive the same. If the Commissioner shall withhold a certificate from either, its share of such apportionment shall be kept separate in the Treasury until the close of the next session of Congress, in order that it may, if it see fit, appeal to Congress from the determination of the Commissioner. If Congress shall not at its next session direct such share to be paid, it shall be added to the general educational fund.

* * * * *

That to entitle any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia to the benefits of this act, it shall maintain for at least three months in each year until January 1, 1885, and thereafter four months in each year, a system of free public schools for all the children within its limits between the ages of 6 and 16, and shall, through the proper officer thereof, for the year ending the 30th day of June last preceding such apportionment, make full report to the Commissioner of Education of the number of public free schools, the number of teachers employed, the number of school-houses owned and the number of school-houses hired, the total number of children taught during the year, the actual daily attendance, and the actual number of months of the year schools have been maintained in each of the several school districts or divisions of said State, Territory, or District, and the amounts appropriated by the Legislature, or otherwise received for the purpose of maintaining a system of free public schools.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I have had those two sections of the Morrill bill read to show what were the provisions of the bill for which the Senator from Alabama and I voted in reference to the reports that were to be made by the States and the power that was reserved to Congress over the fund. I think if the Senator will compare these provisions with the provisions in the present or Blair bill, he will find that they were quite as onerous and quite as stringent as those of this bill. The States not only had to report the number of schools, the number of school-houses owned, the number of school-houses rented or hired, the number of children in the schools, how long they had been taught, that the schools up to a certain period must be kept open three months in the year, after that period four months, and a long list of this kind of items that must be embraced in the reports made by the different States, and if the States refused or neglected to make the reports then there was an officer here, the Commissioner of Education, who was authorized to look into the matter, and if he was not satisfied with the reports he was authorized to withhold the fund from the State until Congress passed an act relieving the State.

It is true, that under it the State of Alabama, the State of Georgia, and other States might be brought to the bar of the Senate and House, as the Senator from Alabama said in his speech on Saturday. That was the unpleasant part of the bill; but notwithstanding that provision in the bill the Senator from Alabama supported it and spoke in very high terms of the measure. It is true that he and I both voted to strike out these provisions, but when a majority of the Senate refused to strike them out we both voted for the bill, and I think we did right under all the circumstances.

Mr. Kernan, then a Senator from New York, moved to strike out the provision in reference to the power of the Commissioner of Education to withhold the fund. I am not sure whether there was a motion to strike out the other section or not. At least that was the distasteful part of it; but under all the circumstances, believing it was constitutional and that we had the right to pass the bill, we voted for it with these provisions contained in it. There is nothing in the present bill that seems to me to be more objectionable or more stringent than the provisions in that bill for which most of the Democrats as well as Republicans voted.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to add in this connection that the Morrill bill appropriated the whole proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and the income from the Patent Office, as an educational fund, the principal of which was to be annually invested in 4 per cent. stocks of the United States, and the interest only distributed. On motion of Mr. Teller, Senator from Colorado, that was changed in Committee of the Whole so as to distribute the principal, but in the Senate there was a failure to concur in that amendment, and as the bill passed the Senate it provided for the distribution of only the interest of the fund. I presume it will not be denied by the honorable Senator from Alabama or any other Senator that that was an appropriation of money belonging to the United States—money that had been raised by taxation, at least so far as the Patent Office money was concerned. The Senator from Alabama shakes his head. I shall therefore have to read a few authorities on that subject. I thought my friend the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] made that question so clear the other day in his very able speech on the subject that it would not longer be questioned that money raised in that way is money raised by taxation; but as the Senator from Alabama still denies it, I will refer to the authorities. Story on the Constitution, volume 1, section 950, says:

In a general sense all contributions imposed by the Government upon individuals for the service of the State are called taxes, by whatever name they may be known, whether by the name of tribute, tithe, tallage, impost, duty, gabel, custom, subsidy, aid, supply, excise, or other name. In this sense they are usually divided into two great classes, those which are direct and those which are indirect. Under the former denomination are included taxes on land, or real property, and under the latter taxes on articles of consumption. The Constitution, by giving the power to lay and collect taxes in general terms, doubtless meant to include all sorts of taxes, whether direct or indirect. But it may be asked, if such was the intention why were the subsequent words "duties," "imposts," and "excises," added in the clause? Two reasons may be suggested; the first, that it was done to avoid all possibility of doubt in the construction of the clause, since in common parlance the word "taxes" is sometimes applied in contradistinction to duties, imposts, and excises, and in the delegation of so vital a power it was desirable to avoid all possible misconception of this sort; and, accordingly, we find in the very first draught of the Constitution these explanatory words are added. Another reason was that the Constitution prescribed different rules of laying taxes in different cases, and therefore it was indispensable to make a discrimination between the classes to which each rule was meant to apply.

That is very high authority, and it is certainly too broad to admit of any doubt as to the meaning of it.

I read now from Cooley's Constitutional Limitations. He says:

Taxes are defined to be burdens or charges imposed by the legislative power upon persons or property to raise money for public purposes. The power to tax rests upon necessity, and is inherent in every sovereignty. The legislature of every free state will possess it under the general grant of legislative power, whether particularly specified in the constitution among the powers to be exercised by it or not. No constitutional government can exist without it.

I need not read all the author says on that subject. It is sufficient to say that taxes are defined to be "burdens or charges imposed by the legislative power." The legislative power imposes a burden or charge on every person who makes a discovery that he desires to have patented of paying into the Treasury a certain fee; that is, an amount of money raised by the imposition of an act of Congress. It is imposed by legislative authority, and it is therefore a tax.

Blackstone, in his Commentaries, which I thought I had before me but I have not at this minute, lays down the rule that the receipts from the post-office fall under this head. I think I need not elaborate that. It seems to me there is no sort of question about it, that an amount of money raised by authority of law from citizens, no matter whether it be a fee paid for the privilege of getting a patent or whether it is a fee paid for a license to distill whisky, or whether it is a fee paid for a license to sell tobacco, or any other imposition of like character, is a tax in the general sense of the term.

Therefore, Mr. President, I take it that the Morrill bill provided for the distribution of a portion of the money raised by taxation among the States for educational purposes, and not only so, but it provided for the distribution of the entire proceeds of the sales of the public lands—no matter where they came from, what part of the Union or what part of the Territory, if the public lands were sold, the income was paid into the Treasury of the United States and became the money of the United States, and became subject at once, if the bill had become a law, to be set apart as an educational fund.

I know there have been fine-spun distinctions attempted to be drawn here between the voting of lands belonging to the people and the money belonging to the people. The question was very properly put by the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] the other day when the honorable Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] was delivering his fine speech on this question: suppose we were to distribute the land in Alaska for which we paid $7,000,000 raised by taxation on the people, would we have a right to do it? The honorable Senator from Mississippi replied that we would, and we might then sell Alaska again and buy it back again and distribute it every time over and over. If it is necessary to go through all that humbuggery each time or the proceedings necessary to meet that fine-spun distinction, I had rather say, we should only have to buy Canada or Cuba occasionally and distribute the proceeds for the education of the people. There would be no objection to that it seems; that would be constitutional; but we can not take the money, it is said, out of a sum that has been raised by taxation. I have shown though very clearly, whatever dispute there may be about land, that the money raised by the Patent Office is a tax, money belonging to the people of the United States in the Treasury, and the Senator from Alabama voted to take it out of the Treasury and distribute it for this very purpose.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Allow me to ask whether there be any distinction between a bill to provide for the education of the mass of the whole American people and the education of the blind people of the United States?

Mr. BROWN. I am not able to see how there can be any distinction so far as the question of power is concerned. If the Government of the United States has the right to educate the blind, it has the right to educate those who can see. If it has the right to educate in the primary branches, it has the right to educate in high schools or in colleges. There can be no distinction in principle.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator from Florida if the United States Government has ever done such a thing as to educate the blind in the respective States?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. It has appropriated a large sum of money out of the tax-payers as a fund to aid in the education of the blind.

Mr. BUTLER. Precisely; but that does not answer the question I put to the Senator. I asked him if Congress had ever made an appropriation such as is contemplated by this bill to educate the blind.

Mr. BROWN. I will show when the time comes what Congress has done.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I will say that in the Forty-fifth Congress a bill passed both Houses appropriating $150,000 in aid of the education of the blind. The bill shows for itself.

Mr. BUTLER. Upon what plans?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The details I do not go into. The principle is what I speak of—as to the question of power.

Mr. BUTLER. Congress makes very large appropriations for the Military Academy at West Point; so it does for the Naval Academy at Annapolis; but they are confessedly national institutions.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. This was a Kentucky institution, located in Louisville.

Mr. BUTLER. I believe the Government has built an asylum for the deaf-mutes in this District, but that the Government has clear and unquestionable jurisdiction over——

Mr. JONES, of Florida. This was not for the District.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me. Unless I very much err in my recollection, Congress passed a bill making quite a liberal grant to the blind asylum in the State of Kentucky, which was carried through under the direction of the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] a few years ago. I aided somewhat in its passage.

Mr. BUTLER. That was not the point I made to the Senator from Florida. That applies to only one State. Is there any bill that has been introduced in Congress and passed that appropriated money for all the States alike, thus interfering with the domestic affairs of the States? That is the point I want answered. I want some Senator to tell me where Congress has appropriated one dollar of a character such as is contemplated in this bill.

Mr. BROWN. I prefer to pass that. It will lead to long discussion.

Mr. BUTLER. I beg pardon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). The Senator from Georgia resumes the floor.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I am aware that a great deal has been said here about the views taken of the powers of Congress in the early period of the Government by Jefferson and other distinguished patriots of that day, and it has been said that they did not find in the Constitution a grant for the education of the people, and the honorable Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] read from one of Jefferson's messages on Saturday afternoon to show that fact. I only want to refer to one sentence of the portion of the message which was read by the Senator from Texas. Referring to the indirect tax-payers, Jefferson says:

> Their patriotism would certainly prefer its continuance and application to the great purposes of the public education, roads, rivers, canals, and such other objects of public improvement as it may be thought proper to add to the constitutional enumeration of Federal powers.

The Senator read that to show that Mr. Jefferson thought it was necessary to change the Constitution before Congress could appropriate money to aid in the cause of education; that it was necessary to add further enumerations to the Federal powers; but let it be borne in mind that in the very same sentence Mr. Jefferson classed roads and rivers and canals with education. If it is necessary to have an amendment of the Constitution and an enlargement of the enumerated powers before you can appropriate money for education, Mr. Jefferson being the authority, then, as the honorable Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] stated so well in his able speech of Saturday evening, where do you get the authority to appropriate money for the improvement of rivers and harbors if you can not make appropriations for education? Jefferson classed the two together. In the sentence I read from his message Jefferson spoke of the necessity of an enlargement of the enumerated powers of the Federal Government before you could appropriate money for either. There has been no such enlargement on this point, as Senators I suppose will all admit, and still at every session of Congress, while the question is raised as to our right to appropriate money for education, we do appropriate large sums for the improvement of rivers and harbors. Where do we get the power to do the one and not the other? Mr. Jefferson classed them together.

Mr. BAYARD. May I answer?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAYARD. Undoubtedly Mr. Jefferson made the statement that the Senator has read from his message. About twenty-four years after that time the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden was heard in the Supreme Court, and the argument of Mr. Webster and the judgment of Chief-Justice Marshall not only urged but determined that the subject-matter of rivers and harbors was exclusively under the control of the National Government. That opinion was the reflex of the public opinion, and it has been acted upon from that day until this without a questioning voice anywhere.

Mr. BROWN. What was the date of that opinion?

Mr. BAYARD. The decision was in 1826, and that decision was in accord and has been accepted without dissent in this country from any quarter that I have heard of. It has been followed by the court, and is laid down so luminously and so clearly as the great pathway of the national power over the rivers and harbors of the country as essentially a part of the national commerce, the power to regulate which was expressly given to Congress, that that has been the only accepted interpretation of the Constitution since the time it was so decided.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, there are two satisfactory replies to my honored friend from Delaware. One is that Mr. Jefferson classed the two together, education and rivers, canals and roads. If the Supreme Court has decided in one case that there was no necessity for an amendment of the Constitution, but that the power existed, then it is fair to suppose that Mr. Jefferson, having classed them together, the other question, if before the court, would have been decided in the same way. Mr. Jefferson had one of those master minds that did not make mistakes in these classifications. He saw and said that they both stood upon the same ground, upon the same common level. I do not quote his language. The Supreme Court has said since, in the case of one of them, according to the Senator from Delaware, that the power does exist without constitutional amendment. Then, if Mr. Jefferson is good authority, the power exists in the other also, and the constitutionality is established.

But I can not quite concur in recollection with my friend from Delaware in reference to this power never having been questioned since that time. I am very much mistaken in my recollection if it has not been questioned several times in the national Democratic platform since 1827. And a system of internal improvements by the General Government has been condemned over and over again in the platform of the Democratic party since the decision referred to.

The Senator from Delaware, therefore, is utterly at fault when he states that it has not been questioned. It may not have been questioned by the Supreme Court since that time, but prior to the late war it was questioned over and over again in the national platform of the Democratic party, of which he is an honored member. It is true, since the war we have yielded it. The Southern rule of strict construction then contended for generally controlled the Democratic conventions. We denied the power then, and still there were acts passed by every Congress giving aid to improve rivers and harbors in Northern and Western States. We refused to take the appropriations in the South, standing on principle, and we have greatly suffered by it; but now nobody questions it, neither the Democratic party in its conventions nor the Republican party in its conventions.

So much, then, for the objection that Mr. Jefferson thought there ought to be additional enumerations of Federal power before education or the improvement of roads or rivers and harbors could be taken up under the jurisdiction of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. BAYARD. May I interrupt my friend?

Mr. BROWN. Certainly, for a question or a suggestion.

Mr. BAYARD. Undoubtedly as each case arose, whether an appropriation was national in its character or whether it was for purely local interest, the principle was sought to be applied. As river and harbor bills have been presented to Congress in many cases, there could be so little pretense that the navigation of the Union, the commerce of the Union, was involved in local expenditures, that it has led to protest after protest, rather against the facts of the given case than against the broad principle which it is asserted had been established by the decision of the Supreme Court and I think to the satisfaction of every constitutional lawyer, and that is that the commerce of the Union is the only commerce. There is but one commerce as there is but one flag, and the jurisdiction over commerce is national and is not State.

That I mean to say; but when it comes to making an appropriation to a given river, to a given place on the seacoast, it may well be that the uses to which the river can be put are so restricted, so petty, and so confined that it does not rise to the dignity of commerce or of navigation, and therefore it has been said "it is local and not national; commit it, therefore, to the interest of the locality and not give it to the General Government." That is what I think is the truth about it.

I beg pardon of my friend for interrupting him.

Mr. BROWN. I am very glad of the interruption.

Mr. President, the reply is that Mr. Jefferson included the whole class of river and harbor improvements and road improvements in the sentence that I have referred to. The Supreme Court in Ogden's case referred to such rivers and harbors as are necessary in carrying on the general commerce of the country. The Senator now draws that distinction, and it is the correct one. But I want to call his attention to this fact. I say that now all parties vote for these appropriations. We have waived that doubt. If we can waive it in the matter of rivers and harbors, why can we not waive it in the much more important matter of the education of the people, where the very life of the nation, as has been said, may be at stake upon it? At every session of Congress we pass laws not only to improve these navigable streams such as are included in the decision in the Ogden case, but we pass them for other smaller rivers, like the French Broad in North Carolina and the Coosawattee in Georgia and trout streams in West Virginia, and yet the Democrats on this side almost unanimously vote for them.

Mr. BAYARD. Not unanimously.

Mr. BROWN. Almost unanimously. In other words, we have waived that. As General Jackson in his Maysville road veto, which was referred to by the Senator from Mississippi the other day, laid down the rule, that where there has been a long practice on a particular line of construction we have no right to set aside the practice established by construction. It is better to adhere to the rule of construction than to interfere by uprooting it. Now, we have done exactly that in the case of rivers and harbors; and if we could waive Mr. Jefferson's scruple as to rivers and harbors that do not come within the Ogden case, why may we not waive it when we come to the question of the education of the great mass of the people, where everything depends upon it. I do not say the life of the nation; I do not agree with the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] on that subject. I do not say that we have the power or that we should have the power, if we have no other constitutional ground for it, to educate the mass of the people because Congress judges that the life of the nation hangs upon it. I do not believe that opinion is concurred in by any one on this side of the Chamber who votes for this bill. I certainly repudiate it; but still I say it is almost a vital question, a very important question at least, to educate the mass of the people, who are to be the future voters of the States and of the United States, for we have now to speak of voters of the United States under the late decisions of the Supreme Court.

I think it is rather late in the day to raise this constitutional question, and it seems to me my friend from Alabama was right about it in the Forty-sixth Congress and is wrong about it now.

Mr. President, one more point, and I shall not further enlarge. Such have been my pleasant relations with the Senator from Alabama and my high regard for him, and such are still my kind relations and my regard for him, that I should not have made any of these criticisms upon his course whether I thought it consistent or inconsistent if it had not been for what seems to me to be an uncalled-for and unjustifiable assault on his part upon those of us on the Democratic side of the Chamber who vote for this bill. That is the object and the only object I have had in view in reviewing his course on this great measure. I find in the RECORD of yesterday the following language:

> Mr. HOAR. The total amount proposed by the amendment is $77,000,000, and the amount in the original bill is $105,000,000, $28,000,000 difference.
> Mr. MORGAN. That is a very small matter, $28,000,000, in a bill of this description, but I would admonish the Senator from Massachusetts that it is really the interest of the friends of the bill to have the amount large, because he will lose votes for it if he does not keep the sum up to $105,000,000. It is not the principle of the bill so much as the amount of money involved in it that gives it currency and popularity and strength, and as he is a friend of the bill he ought to manifest his friendship by keeping up the amount.
> Mr. HOAR. I have said in the hearing of the Senator that I was a friend of this bill.
> Mr. MORGAN. Then I hope the Senator will keep it up to the maximum rate of $105,000,000, and I venture to suggest that he will weaken the bill very much, if he does not actually destroy it, because it will not do to undertake to get the Senators on this side of the Chamber committed to the principle of this bill without furnishing a very large amount of money as an inducement for their votes. [Laughter.] And if there is any disclosure of a policy of a reduction of this amount of money now or hereafter some of the Senators on this side will feel very badly if they should find that their friends on the other side were not going to give the amount of money which it has been understood was to be the fruit of this bill in consideration of their votes.

The amount of money to be the fruit of this bill in consideration of their votes! Mr. President, I say this was gratuitous, uncalled for, and unjustifiable on the part of the Senator from Alabama. He has no right to question my motives or the motives of any other Senator on the Democratic side of this Chamber on this bill or any other. He has no right to say that an amount of money was to be the fruit of the bill in consideration of our votes. That is virtually saying that we would barter our votes for a large enough sum, but you had better not cut down the sum, or they may not be willing to sell out for the smaller amount. Of course that was not the language, but I think that was the idea conveyed to the Senate and to the galleries when the "laughter" came in. I say this was unjustifiable on the part of the Senator. It was unkind, undignified, and unsenatorial.

Mr. President, I will not say that he committed the same error with the same motive that he attributes to us when he gave his vote for this principle precisely in the Morrill bill in the Forty-sixth Congress for a much smaller sum. That was only for one or two millions a year to be added to the school fund, the interest to be distributed, and even that with his then convictions was sufficient to carry his vote. His then convictions were that there was no constitutional difficulty about the bill, and he was right, therefore, in voting for it, if it had been but $50,000 that controlled his vote. He would have done it under a sense of duty as effectively as if $50,000,000 or $500,000,000 were the amount proposed.

I voted with him at the same time for that small amount to be added to the fund to be distributed for the support of education. I believed I was right then. He believed he was right then. I believe I am right now, and I believe he is wrong now. But, while that is my opinion, I have never questioned his motives. He has certainly a right to change his opinion as he has done if he finds he is wrong, and he would neither be an honest man nor a brave man (and he is both) if he failed to change when he found he was wrong. Doubtless he has reasons that are conclusive to his mind why he should have changed his opinion on this question, and I admire him rather than condemn him for the change if he feels it was his duty, but while he is making the change he should be a little more charitable to his brother Senators who choose to continue to stand where he stood then and vote as he voted then.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. VOORHEES. For how long?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Not long. It will be remembered that a short time ago a little colloquy occurred between the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] and myself, and I just want to make a remark; but if the Senator from Indiana prefers the floor——

Mr. VOORHEES. I would yield with great pleasure, as the Senator from Florida knows, and I would to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] who now rises, but perhaps I might as well make the few remarks which I design making at this time as any other, and the Senators will have the time they might occupy now after I get through.

Mr. VOORHEES proceeded to address the Senate. Having spoken till 3 o'clock,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remind the Senator from Indiana that by unanimous consent of the Senate the time for closing general debate has arrived—3 o'clock.

Mr. VOORHEES. I should like ten minutes more.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the Senator have the time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not necessary to make a motion. The Senator is entitled to speak. These understandings are not put from the Chair as orders of the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. Still, in view of the fact that it was an understanding which the Senator from Indiana would not be willing to violate, I ask that the question be put to the Senate if unanimous consent is not given.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection, under the understanding that the Senator from Indiana be permitted to proceed? The Chair hears none.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I only want to occupy the floor a few minutes in justice to my friend from Alabama. I feel that after the attention I have given to the Senator from Missouri the Senator from Alabama would feel justly hurt if I did not notice a most extraordinary matter connected with his argument on this floor.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I have been a listener to this most instructive debate from the beginning, and it was my intention to have so remained to the end. No discussion in this body since the war has been of greater importance in my judgment or will be more fruitful or far-reaching in beneficial results than the one now drawing to a close. The measure itself now before the Senate has never been surpassed in the elevation and benevolence of its spirit nor in the magnitude and value of its immediate and ultimate purposes.

But tempting as has been the subject and deeply interested as I have been, yet I would not have asked to detain the Senate a single moment had it not been for the tone of certain remarks made in the close of the discussion on Saturday evening by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. It seemed to be their object to make it appear disreputable for a Senator on this side to support this bill because it had met the approval of a caucus on the other side of the Chamber. I will have to entertain a far lower estimate of my own independence of character before I will be driven from doing what my conscience and my judgment conceive to be right because other people who do not agree with me on other subjects may agree with me on this one. I can imagine no argument less likely to influence my mind or conduct than such an one. Whether this bill has been the subject of caucus by Republican Senators I know not and care not. On a measure of this kind, so non-partisan, so utterly destitute of politics in every line and feature, I would meet with Senators of every shade of opinion anywhere and everywhere. I could meet in consultation with the other side of the Chamber on a measure like this without fearing any danger to my own position in my own party. A Senator whose party relations may be endangered or misunderstood by consulting with his political opponents on a measure of education, of progress, of the enlightenment of the people of this country of all parties, all classes, races, and conditions, must have very insecure and infirm political affiliations.

Mr. President, in the simplest way possible and in the briefest I propose to give some of the reasons why I look favorably upon this measure. It comes in the right spirit. Any measure coming here as a measure of peace between the sections should be received with grateful approbation by every lover of his country. In the organization of our Government there was a calamity interwoven with its very foundation, there was a cause of sectional strife and alienation, an element of eternal irritation and bitterness, an institution embodied in our fundamental law from which sprang the irrepressible conflict. For that institution one section is not more responsible at the bar of history than another. It resulted, however, in those scenes of ruin and disaster over which the whole country, the North and the South, have alike wept. Any measure, therefore, that comes here in the spirit of fraternity I welcome as a peace offering and rejoice in it as a means of harmony and restored unity.

Sir, as a measure of amity and good-will this bill comes from the right quarter; it comes from New England, and no nobler offering to the welfare of this whole country ever emanated from that section. Do Senators expect me, standing here as I do allied by blood and lineage to the South and representing in part a great Western State, to be less liberal toward the Southern people than New England? Indeed, no one has manifested any pleasure in opposing this great measure. Even those who oppose it on constitutional grounds openly lament the necessity of doing so, announcing with emphasis that all their sympathies are with the measure. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], opposing the bill with great ability, nevertheless has recognized its kind and fraternal spirit. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON], and I believe the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] have concurred in that view.

The good faith of this measure as one of conciliation and kindness to the South can not be questioned. It embraces the present and future generations of both races. The prejudices of New England and the North are laid aside in its provisions. It can not be said that its New England origin has caused any discrimination in favor of the colored race. It takes the illiterate white child by the hand as well as the illiterate black. Its object is to lay open the book of knowledge with an impartial hand.

Am I not justified, then, in saying that it is a great measure of conciliation such as we all would have gladly welcomed at any time during the last twenty years? What have good men prayed for more than any other one thing in this country? They have prayed for peace upon the troubled waters; they have invoked the spirit of reconciliation. I hail this great measure as the most progressive and powerful movement for reconciliation, peace, and harmony that has been known in the history of this Government.

But, Mr. President, there is another reason in this connection why I look with favor on this bill. It is a proper recognition of a just responsibility on the part of the whole people toward the negro race. It is sometimes contended that the Southern people should alone be charged with the care of the black man and black woman; that all the ills and burdens which have been entailed on the South are due to the fact that the South was solely responsible for slavery. At the date of the Revolution slavery existed by law in every American colony.

The responsibility for American slavery must be borne alike by the North and the South. The original act of injustice to the negro was the work of the whole American people. His enslavement was agreed to in the Constitution by every State, and it is eminently right that all alike shall now bear the burden of his education and join in rendering him the aid which is his due. The curse of slavery fell on the colored man in the North as well as in the South, and it was never withdrawn from him in the North until his labor was unprofitable. All sections shared the responsibility and should share alike the just claims of the negro for such reparation as may be best for him and his race.

If the education and enlightenment of this once oppressed race is right in itself, then let the whole country take part in it; the work should devolve on no one section alone, even if that section was able to meet such a responsibility.

But, sir, if the work contemplated in this bill should be devolved on the South alone, what is the spectacle presented? Everybody concedes that the South is unable to accomplish it. I heard my distinguished friend from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] oppose the bill. I did not agree with him, and yet it afforded me pleasure to hear him. There was a magic in the manly courage with which he contended that the South was able for this stupendous task alone. God helps those who help themselves, and in the spirit of that doctrine I will respond to the Senator from South Carolina by saying that I will all the more cheerfully aid his people because of the fact that they are doing all they can to help themselves. In fact, I would have but little hope of the future if the Southern people themselves had fallen short of their duty.

The Senator made a strong showing of growth and progress in South Carolina and claimed for her the ability to do all that is requisite for the education of all her people of both races. I rejoice at the picture of prosperity which he displayed, but I fear to agree with him; and even if South Carolina can do all that is claimed, still there are other States which are powerless in the presence of the needs of their people. I love to see the Senator put his State to the front, take all the honor that is her due, and show that she has progressed, improved, and applied her resources justly and equitably to the cause of education.

Other States have also made their showings as to fair dealing with the cause of education. Sir, in this connection I desire to show by the testimony of the colored people themselves that they have been treated by the white people of the South with absolute fairness on the subject of education and in the matter of schools and benevolent institutions.

I wish to show that the State governments of the South can be trusted to make an honorable and fair use of the great fund provided in this bill.

Some years ago the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR], the author of this bill, and myself were members of a committee and made extensive investigation in regard to the discontent and migratory movements of certain portions of the colored race in the South. One of the subjects investigated and on which there was no conflict of testimony, if I remember correctly, was the treatment of the colored children in the schools. That investigation did good It threw light into dark places. Certain evils it is true had taken place. They were corrected by the very fact of agitation, but on the subject of the schools there was but one voice. I read from the testimony of Mr. O'HARA, a very respectable and highly intelligent colored gentleman, who is now a member of the House of Representatives from North Carolina. He was describing the depressed condition of affairs in North Carolina and was asked whether they had not had very destructive floods the year before. He replied:

A. Yes, sir, very; and last year we had droughts also, so that the crops were very short, and that caused labor to be very low; and because of the feeling that exists between the people in that State, I will relate this, that a few Saturdays ago the people living in that section of the country called Scotland Neck held an agricultural meeting. White people and black people met together and had a talk about this subject. Richard A. Smith, a white man and leader there, spoke, and I spoke too, and the result of the meeting was that they thought on account of the increase of the price of cotton they ought to increase the wages of the hands, and they did so. As another remarkable fact connected with this, I will state that there are some colored people who hire laborers in that section and are interested in the price of labor. These whites they have property, and have to have labor to assist them in cultivating it, and naturally they want the labor cheap.

Q. State the condition of the education for children in North Carolina?

A. The condition of the children in North Carolina according to our system at present is poor. I mean poor as to all classes; in our law there can be no discrimination. Eight and one-third per cent. of the property-tax and 75 per cent. of the poll-tax, I think, is used for school purposes, each class getting its pro rata share; and if it had not been for some oversight in the last legislation, an omission to sign the bill, I think, we would have had a very good system of public schools in the State. Of course education is not there for the poor classes as it is in the District of Columbia, where you have large taxes and have a Federal Government to supply it, and in large cities like New York, but I think it will compare favorably with that in any rural district in any section of the country. I read the report of the Commissioner of Education, and see that the schools in the interior of nearly all the States in the rural districts are as nothing compared with the schools in the towns and cities, and I think ours will compare about as favorably as any. We need, however, a great deal of improvement yet, and I think it will come gradually.

Q. Have you seen the last report of the superintendent of education?

A. I have not.

Q. Do you know that the number of children attending school in North Carolina is increasing from year to year?

A. Yes, sir; I know they are increasing from year to year. I think, however, we have made one mistake. I think we have made a sad mistake in the employing of cheap teachers. Our people seem to have got the idea into their heads that $20 a month is paying enough for a teacher, and the result is you can not get first-class teachers. First-class teachers will not work for such a price as that; but wherever they offer $20 for teachers, they pay the same to white teachers and black teachers alike. I know a case in point—

Continues this colored man—

My wife holds a first-class certificate; she receives $20 a month, and teaches a colored school. The daughter of Col. David C. Clark, one of the leading white gentlemen of the city, also holds a first-class certificate; and she teaches a white school at $20 a month.

Then the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] asked him:

This is done in order to make the money spread over as much time as possible?

A. Yes, sir; but there is another result. The best teachers will not remain in such places, but will go where they can be better paid. Only the poorer class of teachers and persons living there, who are not compelled to rely on their teaching for a support—only persons so situated will teach.

Q. Has not your State appropriated money for the establishment of a normal school for the education of teachers?

A. We had a normal school at one time. It was at first only temporary, but I think our Legislature has made it permanent. As we advance and get a little more money we will have more schools of all kinds.

What a touching appeal this is from such a source to men now considering this bill. Again:

Q. Has not the State also provided asylums for the unfortunate of your race?

A. Yes, sir; the same facilities are offered the black and white alike in that respect. We have a deaf and dumb school for the colored people, under the same rules and government as that for white people; they are taught, fed, and clothed under the same system as the whites. In fact, it is not very long since I went through both institutions—the one on one side of our city, the other on the other. They have the same kind of provision, meats, vegetables, and fruits; the same bedding and furniture, carpets, pianos, &c., all the same in both institutions, without any discrimination at all.

Q. What provision has been made for the insane?

A. Owing to the crowded condition of our present insane asylum, it has been found necessary to build two others; one for the whites at Morganton, and one at Greensborough, in what is called the "negro belt," exclusively for colored people—an institution that will compare favorably with institutions of the same kind in any part of that country; as good as the one they are building for the whites at Morganton.

Q. It is not as large?

A. No; it is not as large; it is not necessary that it should be as large, because our percentage of insane is not as large as it is among whites; and the negro population is only one-third that of the whites.

I have read this testimony in support of the bill in order to show that we are bestowing this fund upon States and peoples who are treating the colored people fairly, and as a guarantee that the fund will not be abused, that there will be no discrimination made in its use on account of race or color. I wish no element of distrust to be in this bill. I will not vote for it if the guardianship of the Federal Government follows a dollar of the money into the States. I shall vote for it with full confidence or not vote for it at all. I shall confide entirely or I will not confide at all. For that reason I am showing that in regard to education and benevolence schools and charities have been established in the South for the black man as well as for the white man. This great and undisputed fact pleads in eloquent tones for the passage of this bill.

There was a wide field of this kind of testimony which I might read by the hour. Much of it came from North Carolina, and all to her honor. There was much also from Louisiana, all to the same general purport. I pass it over, but I am tempted beyond my power of resistance to read to the Senate a few answers which were elicited from a man whom the Senator from New Hampshire will well remember. He came from the county of Bolivar, Mississippi, the region of the Yazoo, in that State. His face was as black as the wing of a raven. He was dressed as well as any Senator on this floor. He bore himself with great propriety of demeanor and with an unassuming dignity that was pleasant to witness. His name was Lewis Stubblefield. He told us he was born in Virginia, was a slave until Lee surrendered, and had not $3 worth of clothing on his back at that time. When he came before us he was the owner, with an unencumbered title, of over six hundred acres of Bolivar County bottom-land, said to be as productive as any the world contains. He owned cattle and horses, mules and hogs; he hired labor, this full-blooded African, and white labor in many instances. After telling the committee that he had made all his lands and stock by his hard work and attention to business since the war, and that there was nothing to prevent any other man of his race from doing as well in that State, he testified as follows about school privileges:

Q. Mr. Stubblefield, how is it about opportunities for schooling your children in your county?

A. Well, sir, our people in Bolivar has the same chance that the whites does for schooling their children—

I read his imperfect grammar as it is printed here—

there is no exception made in the schools at all.

What an overwhelming piece of proof that is.

The schools are kept up—

Continues the questioner—

by the taxation of the people, are they?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where the colored man has property he pays the school taxes the same as the white man does?

A. Yes, sir; it is all equal as to that.

Q. And all share alike in the privileges of the schools?

A. Yes, sir; that portion of the business has been passing through my hands for the last eight years; I am identified with that sort of work.

He was a supervisor of schools.

Q. How many members are there in your board of supervisors?

A. Five men on our board, sir; one member from each of the supervising districts.

Q. How many of these supervisors on your board are white and how many are colored?

A. Three are white and two are colored; but the three whites are there by my consent.

He was in a county with a large colored majority. Continued he:

We would have elected on last Tuesday a week ago another member, a colored man, but I would not consent to it.

He wanted the white man to remain. And much more I might read. Among nearly a hundred colored men called as witnesses, that was the burden of the testimony of each one. I remember that this man Stubblefield stated he was a Republican in politics, and on election day that he often rode with his neighboring land-owner, a white man, and a late confederate officer, to the polls, and while his white neighbor voted the Democratic ticket he voted the Republican ticket without molestation. Am I wrong in supposing that it is proper and right to adduce these facts to Senators in order to inspire confidence in the disposal of so large a sum of money?

I am told, however, Mr. President, that with all the good purposes of this bill it is not within the purview of the Constitution. I am not here to dwell on the benefits and blessings of education, nor am I here to discuss the decisions of courts or what the distinguished men of the earlier days of the Republic have individually said in regard to the powers of this Government, but I am here to declare what every man knows and what no one will deny, that the cause of education has been recognized in the acts of the Government itself as a national cause from the first hour of its existence until the present moment. It was recognized by Washington and in the utterances of all the fathers and framers of the Constitution. The cause of education, I repeat, was recognized and recommended as a national cause, a cause with which the welfare of the country was intimately associated.

The policy of this Government on this subject is as plain as a well-beaten pathway. I might follow the example of other Senators and read the letters, the messages, the reports of distinguished men of the past and the decisions of the courts. Will it not, however, be quite as conclusive as to the powers of the Government to show what it has actually done at every stage of its existence as to point out what eminent men and the courts have said it might do? I, too, might quote opinions, but I prefer to state facts. When I show what the Government has done upon this very question I presume it will be conceded that no higher authority can be produced. The policy of the Government is so continuous and unbroken that it has received the support of all the wise and great in our history.

What do we see when we turn to this policy? Every State admitted into the Union since the adoption of the Constitution has received upon her admission a birthday present, as it were, a rich donation of lands, an educational endowment in behalf of the children she was to bring forth and train up for duty as American citizens. This was a present from the National Government to every State; to yours, sir [Mr. HARRIS, in the chair], and to mine; and what a splendid endowment it has been! Can I stand here and forget what was done for my own State? Indiana had her sixteenth section; she had her university lands; she had her land-scrip given to her in lieu of lands that could not be taken up in her own borders. Am I to ignore these facts when an appeal is made to me by people who have had thrown upon them an unnatural and abnormal condition of affairs in the liberation and enfranchisement of a whole race buried in ignorance? New States came into the Union with natural surroundings and with no exceptional burdens. The Southern States are struggling to-day with a problem heretofore unknown in human history and with a responsibility far beyond their power to meet. But with no such appalling circumstances surrounding the other States of the Union, the policy of this Government toward them has been all the time in the exercise of that power which is now denied by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] and other Senators on this floor, when it is invoked for the relief of the afflicted States of the South.

Every sixteenth section of public land in the States admitted prior to 1848 and every sixteenth and thirty-sixth section of such land in the States and Territories since organized have been granted for educational purposes. The lands granted for educational purposes, both for common schools and universities, throughout the Union have amounted to nearly 100,000,000 acres. Yet I am told that the Goverament has not the power to aid the cause of education in the States. Why not the power?

Do you answer that lands can be granted but not money? I had promised myself that I would not waste any time on that point. Money is no more a thing of value than land. One is a commodity as the other is. Money is worth only what it can be exchanged for, and so are lands; and when lands are donated, it is with the express understanding that the State can exchange them at once for any other commodity, money or anything else, that will best promote the cause of education. I shall waste but little time on that point. According to this distinction between the donation of lands and the donation of money Congress has the power to grant the recently acquired Territory of Alaska to the several States for educational purposes, well knowing that the States would sell the Territory and apply the proceeds to their schools, but Congress could not have donated the seven millions to the States for school purposes which we paid to Russia for the Territory. Such a proposition only needs to be stated to be rejected.

The following table of lands granted for school purposes will be of interest as illustrating the policy of the Government on this subject:

| State. | Year. | Acres. |
|---|---|---|
| Ohio | 1803 | 704,488 |
| Indiana | 1816 | 650,317 |
| Illinois | 1818 | 985,066 |
| Missouri | 1820 | 1,199,130 |
| Alabama | 1819 | 902,774 |
| Mississippi | 1803 | 837,584 |
| Louisiana | 1806 | 786,044 |
| Michigan | 1836 | 1,067,397 |
| Arkansas | 1836 | 886,460 |
| Florida | 1845 | 908,503 |
| Iowa | 1845 | 905,144 |
| Wisconsin | 1846 | 958,649 |
| California | 1853 | 6,719,324 |
| Minnesota | 1857 | 2,969,990 |
| Oregon | 1859 | 3,329,706 |
| Kansas | 1861 | 2,801,306 |
| Nevada | 1864 | 3,935,428 |
| Nebraska | 1864 | 2,702,044 |
| Colorado | 1875 | 3,715,555 |

In addition to these grants to the States there have been donated over 30,000,000 acres to the eight organized Territories of the United States, making an aggregate of lands granted to the States and Territories for school purposes of 67,893,919 acres.

Then, for the purpose of aiding in the establishment of universities, still other lands have been donated to the States and Territories, amounting in all to 1,165,520 acres.

Next comes the land-scrip. I have other tables and figures here which I will not dwell on at length. But I see that one university in Indiana is put down in this official report as the recipient of over $212,000, proceeds of the sale of land-scrip which was issued to Indiana in lieu of land that she could not locate within her borders. There are some striking revelations in these statistics. The need of the South is very sore, and yet abundance has in some instances been given where nothing was needed. California, coming into this Union thirty years ago with a crown of gold upon her head and untold wealth in all her veins, was the recipient from the Government of nearly seven million acres of land for educational purposes. She was rich, with a magnificent future before her; yet the power of the Government was thought to be equal to the task of giving her a great domain besides; now it is denied to the States that are poor and depressed indeed.

Allow me to call attention also to the transactions of 1836 between the Federal Government and the States, which resulted in vast assistance to the cause of education within the States. They illustrate the fact that Federal assistance has taken every shape. In 1836 the Federal Government found itself with a surplus of revenue on its hands, and by act approved June 23, 1836, provision was made to deposit the same with the States in proportion to their representation. The amounts thus deposited with the States will be shown by the appended table:

|---|---|
| Maine | $955,838 25 |
| New Hampshire | 669,086 79 |
| Massachusetts | 1,338,173 58 |
| Vermont | 669,086 79 |
| Connecticut | 764,670 60 |
| Rhode Island | 382,335 30 |
| New York | 4,014,520 71 |
| New Jersey | 764,670 60 |
| Pennsylvania | 2,867,514 78 |
| Delaware | 286,751 49 |
| Maryland | 955,838 25 |
| Virginia | 2,198,427 99 |
| North Carolina | 1,433,757 39 |
| South Carolina | 1,051,422 09 |
| Georgia | 1,051,422 09 |
| Alabama | 689,086 79 |
| Louisiana | 477,919 14 |
| Mississippi | 382,335 30 |
| Tennessee | 1,433,757 39 |
| Kentucky | 1,433,757 39 |
| Ohio | 2,007,260 34 |
| Missouri | 382,335 30 |
| Indiana | 860,254 44 |
| Illinois | 477,919 14 |
| Michigan | 286,751 49 |
| Arkansas | 286,751 49 |
| Total | 28,101,644 91 |

And although the law making this distribution provides for the return of the money to the Federal Treasury "whenever the same shall be required by the Secretary of the Treasury for the purpose of defraying any wants of the public Treasury," yet no such requirement has ever been made. Thus we see that for nearly fifty years past the States have enjoyed a practical donation from the Federal Government of more than twenty-eight millions in actual money, which in almost if not quite every instance has been converted into the school funds of the several States. New York thus appropriated the four millions and over which fell to her share, and the other States generally followed her example, while the Federal Government gave its approval by its silent acquiescence.

What else has been done in the matter of education as a national work? Do Senators forget recent events? Since the war more than $6,000,000, not in lands, but in money, have been appropriated by Congress for colored schools in the South. I have the appropriation acts here if there is any question as to my statement. The freedmen's schools have been fed with national appropriations during the last twenty years, and to the extent of over $6,000,000. Is it not somewhat late in the day to call in question the power of Congress to pass the pending measure? I give you a precedent in your own day and generation. How is it to be answered? Do you oppose this bill by saying that the schools for the freedmen were unconstitutional? Why, then, was that question not tested in the courts? It could easily have been done at the proper time.

But, sir, I come to a still later date and even a more striking illustration. Within the last twelve months, during the last fiscal year, Congress appropriated $400,000 with which to educate the Indian children at Hampton and at Carlisle. How will you answer that? Where were the voices now so eloquent, where the speeches now so learned and so long, when that bill passed the Senate, taking $400,000 of tax-raised revenue out of the Treasury with which to instruct and enlighten the little copper-colored, dark-eyed, straight-haired children of the desert within a hundred miles of this Capitol? Where were these vigilant sentries of the Constitution then? Were they dozing on their posts, or is the dusky Indian dearer in their regard than their own blood and kin? The white child is in this bill; the white face is here as well as the dark one. Is the barbarian's child of the forests, the offspring of the frontiers, a more important and cherished object of your care than the white child of the South? Does the Constitution expand in its application in one direction and contract in another? Is there a certain elasticity in the Constitution toward the schools at Hampton and Carlisle and a contractability in the same instrument when applied to schools of your own?

I am amazed, it fills me with wonder when I hear some of the arguments which have been advanced on this floor. There is not a year, nor a month, nor a week, nor a day since 1789 to the present hour in which the authority in this bill in one shape or another has not been the active policy of this Government for our own people as well as for other races. This policy fills all our history with its precedents and the whole land with its blessings.

But, Mr. President, we have heard much able and learned discussion in regard to a strict construction of the Constitution. Sir, I am for a strict construction of the Constitution. I am for strictly construing it in order to accomplish, not to defeat, the great ends for which it was ordained. I wish to so construe it as to promote and fulfill those beneficent and lofty aims proclaimed in the instrument itself. I would strictly construe that immortal instrument as a vital, affirmative force for the achievement of its own declared purposes and the accomplishment of our destiny as a united and enlightened Republic. To me it means what it says; to my mind there is not a meaningless provision in it. When it declares its purpose "to promote the general welfare," and declares further on among the grant of powers that Congress shall provide for that great end I do not feel at liberty to assume that the framers of the Constitution were indulging in words, mere words, without meaning, life, or force. I firmly believe too that the power of self-preservation exists in this Government. The object of its creation was to live, not to die.

I never did believe, and do not now, that a power was originally injected into the Constitution by which this Government could be destroyed. I never did believe, and do not now, that there were reserved powers in the States by which this Government could be dissolved and broken up. I did not believe it before the war nor during the war, and took every proper opportunity to say so. I do believe there are certain great rights reserved to the States for their sole exercise; they are easily found and are of inestimable value, but the doctrine of State rights has been carried too far in the past, and will be again whenever it is invoked to defeat legislation of the kind we are now considering.

Sir, we have had an era of strict construction. May I not talk plainly? May I not say what is in my mind to say? The strict construction of ante-war times was born of an institution which exists no more. The opposition in the Southern mind to a liberal construction of the powers of the Federal Government originated with the institution of slavery. It was your local and domestic institution; you had it to protect; you dreaded the interference of the Federal authority in the slightest degree, and in proportion as you were threatened with that power you vehemently denied its existence in any and every form in which it was asserted. This was no more than natural, but the reason which made the rule then has passed away, and now there is no people, there are no States in this Union whose future hope and welfare are so vitally interwoven with a liberal construction of the Constitution as the people and States of the South. In ten thousand ways, from year to year, the Federal Government can and will encourage, foster, and promote their great local interests, extend them a helping hand in the development of their mighty resources and in enhancing their general prosperity. The noble self-reliance, fortitude, and industry of the Southern people since the war have touched the heart of the whole country, and they need no longer fear the power of the Federal Government. Mutterings and menaces may now and then occur for partisan purposes, but they will pass speedily and harmlessly away. Were I a Southern Senator I would hail such a measure as this as the dawn of a new and a better day for me and for mine.

But, sir, even when we were in strict construction times, when the Government was administered by men who guarded narrowly, as it is now contended, against the faintest trace of an invasion of the rights of the States by the Federal Government, what did we accomplish? Let us go back and see whether we were so very powerless even then. The purchase of Louisiana has been alluded to here, and Jefferson has been quoted on that subject. It might have been said further that he was thought in certain quarters liable to impeachment for making that purchase. There is no enumerated power in the Constitution authorizing it, and Jefferson himself doubted whether there was an implied power. He said as much. He said he had done an act beyond the Constitution, and suggested an amendment to cover and protect the transaction. I regard Jefferson as the wisest political thinker in human history, and yet the men who surrounded him, who were his advisers and counselors, decided against his suggestion in this instance and convinced him that the amendment was not necessary, that the Constitution warranted what he had done. The judgment of his contemporaries and of posterity has sanctioned the great act as essential to the general welfare and glory of the country.

And did we not at a later day and in the exercise of the same power take Texas to our arms? I will not say that we purchased Texas as we did Louisiana, but there is an analogy between the transactions; we paid the debts of Texas and took her into the family of States. Where was the power to do that? The treaty-making power? The treaty-making power can add nothing to the powers of the Constitution already there. It has been said that Louisiana and Texas were secured under the clause which authorizes us to provide for the common defense; that Louisiana might have been used to our detriment by a foreign power; that England was conspiring to get a foothold in Texas; and therefore we had a right to secure possession of these vast scopes of territory as a measure of common defense. Sir, I was raised upon a farm, my father owned land, and I remember that he acted sometimes upon the same principle in buying a piece of land contiguous to him.

But surely the Constitution means nothing of that kind. If it does we can buy Canada and clear up to the North Pole on the same principle. No; the simple truth is Jefferson saw that the exclusive possession of the channel and of the mouth of the Mississippi River were necessary to the general welfare, the prosperity, advancement, wealth, and growth of the country, and he grasped the occasion to accomplish these legitimate objects of Government with more eagerness and zeal than is usual in an executive officer. Nearly the entire correspondence on the subject with the minister of the great Napoleon will be found in Jefferson's own hand, although his Secretary of State was one of the most accomplished men of his times.

Texas came to us upon the same principles which governed Jefferson in securing Louisiana; then the vast acquisitions of territory following the Mexican war, until now all that mighty region from British America to the Gulf of Mexico, from the Mississippi River to the Pacific Ocean, stands to-day, and will stand forever, as a monument to the foresight, sagacity, and prophetic statesmanship of Thomas Jefferson while executing the welfare clause of the Constitution, without a single specific grant of power to warrant the first steps taken or any that followed. There it stands, the seat of present and future empire. We secured it all during the days of strict construction. Louisiana, Texas, and all the other vast regions I have mentioned confront us as a stupendous refutation of the idea that we can do nothing for the general welfare under a strict construction of the Constitution.

Sir, it seems to me that if we can spread our banner by purchase and by conquest over foreign soil, if we can extend the boundaries of the Republic, we can, without a specific grant of power, also erect schoolhouses and educate our people. But let us examine this point a little further in relation to what has already been done. Under the doctrine now advanced against the pending bill where is the power authorizing the purchase and collection of a Congressional Library? Under what head does it come? If this doctrine is to prevail we must abandon the Library to its fate; we must also wipe out many of the most brilliant and most patriotic events in our history. Where is the authority to gather the natural wealth of the world, its curiosities, its subjects of science, in the Smithsonian Institution and the National Museum? Do you reply that the Constitution makes it our duty to promote the arts and sciences? That is true, but the clause of the Constitution which declares that duty also provides the means for its execution by copyright and by patents granted to inventors. That is the specific limitation as to the means whereby the arts and sciences are to be promoted. Where, then, is the power by which the grizzly bear of the Sierras is caught, skinned, and made to stand as if in life in the Smithsonian? Where is the power by which the bones of that magnificent king of race horses, Lexington, were procured and are now on exhibition as a model equine skeleton in the same institution? Where is the power that gathers the fishes of the sea, the reptiles of the earth, and all the curiosities of animated nature together for instruction at the expense of millions? Will some Senator tell me? I shall not take it as an interruption. Behold our beautiful gardens. I love them; I love to think and to speak of them. I visit them as often as I can. I love to see the wealth and beauty of the physical world. But where is the granted power, unless under the general-welfare clause, for the money we annually appropriate for the botanical and the propagating gardens? I would be glad if some gentleman would point out any other clause.

I am aware that I am but restating the position which the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] assumed on this subject at the opening of this discussion and which he maintained with such conspicuous ability. And in this connection I wish to call attention to a striking fact.

This debate has been long and able on both sides of the question, but I have heard no Senator undertake to answer the legal argument of the Senator from Arkansas. I have heard no one grapple with the decisions cited by him nor with the facts showing the history of our legislation. The argument made by the master mind of the Senator from Arkansas has gone without even attempted refutation. It is a most significant oversight. Nor do I now deem it necessary to discuss the legal aspects of this question further than, as I have heretofore stated, to show what has been done—not so much what has been decided or said, but what has been done. That is all I am seeking to do; for after the argument of the Senator from Arkansas and the very able and thorough arguments of the two Senators from Mississippi and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] the constitutional question is closed forever; nor will it ever again seriously arise in connection with such a measure as this.

But to resume our illustrations of the exercise of power to promote the general welfare.

Why, sir, Jefferson not only purchased Louisiana, but in 1804 he organized and sent forth that immortal exploring expedition led by Lewis and Clarke—Clarke the brother of George Rodgers Clarke, whom John Randolph styled the Hannibal of the West; and Lewis, Jefferson's private secretary. For more than two years they were hidden from the world and thought to be lost. When they returned, however, they were laden with the spoils of knowledge. They had reached the headwaters of the Missouri, crossed the Rocky Mountains near the track where now the Northern Pacific Railroad speeds its locomotive, descended the Columbia River until they looked on the Pacific Ocean from its mouth, making and preserving careful observations and ample notes of all they saw for the use and instruction of the Government. And from that day to this our Territories have all been extensively and thoroughly explored. Go to Major Powell's office in the National Museum and you will see the truth of what I say. But how did those splendid drawings, engravings, and maps of queer and distant scenes and countries come to hang on his walls unless there is some general power such as has been asserted and conclusively demonstrated by the Senator from Arkansas?

As I walk from the Senate to the other end of this Capitol I never pass through the old hall of the House of Representatives without lingering and looking. It has a new name, Statuary Hall, and I see there the statues of the illustrious dead. It is the American Valhalla, "the palace of immortality." Washington is there, and around him in mute majesty are gathered the heroes and leaders of Revolutionary times. Lincoln is there, faithfully delineated in face and form, sad, thoughtful, and care-worn. Kosciusko, over whose fall freedom wept in all lands, is there; and Pulaski, who died at the head of his legion at Savannah for American liberty; and the great soldier Nathaniel Greene, and many others whose names are full of glory, are there. But where is the power in the Constitution to place them there unless the Senator from Arkansas has found it?

Pause also in the Rotunda. There the artist has strongly appealed to every sentiment of patriotic pride in the American heart. There, on canvas, Columbus makes his immortal discovery of a new world, there the Mayflower moves upon the deep; there the Declaration of Independence is signed in solemn and august council; there Burgoyne surrenders; there Cornwallis lays down his sword and the war ends at Yorktown; there Washington returns his commission to Congress and retires to Mount Vernon. Who can look unmoved on such scenes? And yet if the opponents of this bill are right they are all there in violation of the Constitution.

During nearly all my service in the Senate I have been connected with the Committee on the Library. We have purchased valuable papers left by eminent men; also great historic paintings. At the last session of Congress we purchased the celebrated life-size portrait of Washington by Charles Wilson Peale, who was soldier and artist both, for which Washington commenced his sittings at Valley Forge and finished them during the ensuing campaign. During the present session a bill has been reported from the Committee on the Library, and I expect to call it up as soon as possible, to complete the monument at Saratoga in commemoration of the surrender of Burgoyne, in commemoration of that great event which gave us our French alliance and revived the darkening hopes of America. Now, in all these things is it possible that we have been mistaken in our just powers, and have been acting outside the Constitution? Across this broad land from the Atlantic to the Gulf there is a vast belt of country where great and brave armies fought twenty years ago. As the traveler passes through this belt filled with its sad memories he sees here and there the flag of the country flying. Looking beneath its folds he beholds a national cemetery where the dead are buried in clean, well-kept graves, marked with headstones, covered with grass and flowers, and guarded and cared for by a superintendent, a Federal official. Where is the power for this? Sir, the construction which Senators opposed to this bill seek to place on the Constitution is too narrow to embrace our national grave-yards.

Again, I am a representative from a State that is out of debt; its credit is high, it is rich in natural resources and in the graces of cultivation; and yet it has been but a few short weeks since we were compelled to ask and receive aid from Congress in behalf of a portion of our people. Ohio did the same. Those two great empire States of the West came here for charitable assistance. If our Legislature had been in session or could have been called together in time to afford relief we would not have accepted a dollar from the Federal Government. But when our towns were swept away, when our people sent up a cry of suffering, when I spent my mornings in the War Office and my afternoons here and my colleagues were doing the same, ascertaining the necessitous condition of our people and hurrying appropriations through for their assistance, did we stop to question the power of the Government to do what we called for?

In 1882 a flood swept the whole Mississippi Valley, and a half million of money was appropriated to relieve the disasters it inflicted. Other floods will desolate the low plantations of the Mississippi, and we will again come to your aid. When the yellow fever with its sweltering venom smote the towns and cities of the South and destroyed her people at high noon and at midnight a national board of health was organized by act of Congress, with power to call forth all the resources of science to allay the pestilence. If the Government can minister to the ailments of the body in the States why not also to the mind? I do not believe in a government which can not or will not help its people in their distress, in a government whose constitution is to be construed in the way of obstruction and not in the way of promotion.

I repeat, sir, that Indiana is a great and strong State. Her school system is equal to any in the civilized world. She has over $10,000,000 in a permanent school fund, which can be increased but never diminished under our constitution. She owns more than $12,000,000 worth of school property. She is paying between three and four million dollars per annum for school teachers. Coming from such a State as that, can I not afford to go as far as the Senator from New Hampshire, as far as the Senator from Massachusetts, in assisting the cause of education in the South? If I failed to do so, those who know me best I think would be most surprised.

Now, Mr. President, there was an incident in this debate which I must briefly notice. There was a tone of criticism on the part of the Senators from Missouri [Mr. VEST] and Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] on Saturday evening which I thought unwarranted. Perhaps it meant not much more than to remind Democratic Senators to be careful how they voted for this measure, for fear they might find themselves in the Republican party or in some way lose their standing in their own.

There is a great deal too much of this thing at this time; a great deal too much disposition in this body and elsewhere to make some one hobby or some one measure a test of a man's party fealty. I can not be dragooned in that way. I never have been and I never will be. I repeat, perhaps the Senator from Missouri meant no more than in the kindness of his heart to give Senators like myself and others a note of warning. For his kind intentions I thank him, but for some things I shall say now I am afraid he will not thank me. He must believe, however, that I mean well. The Senator from Missouri speaks with a tongue that bears a charm. If I am reading the most fascinating book I lay it down when he rises. His lips seem touched with the honey of Hymettus and his voice is music to all listening ears, but in looking into the record of legislation I fear his memory might be somewhat improved. This is not a fatal infirmity, but is sometimes a troublesome one.

I have here a bill which was introduced on the 12th of February, 1880, by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. It is a bill to incorporate the national educational association. What big, strong words, importing Federal power. The national educational association. Ordinarily I would say that a bill with such a title would fearfully frighten a strict constructionist of the modern school. It organized some fifty or one hundred men, I can not count their names in the bill, into a body-corporate by the name of "The National Educational Association," in and of the District of Columbia.

Sections 2 and 3 provide:

SEC. 2. That the national educational association shall have power to make and amend its constitution, by-laws, and rules, consistently with law, and to hold, by purchase, grant, gift, or otherwise, real or personal estate not exceeding $50,000 in value.

SEC. 3. That twenty-five members of the national educational association shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, and that said association shall meet and organize under this charter on the first Monday of July, 1880, and annually thereafter shall meet at such time and place as it may designate; and whenever called upon by any department of the Government shall investigate and report upon any educational subject without compensation for such services.

This is the organization of an educational bureau by Federal power. When this bill came up in the Senate, I find the following discussion:

Mr. Blaine rose.

Mr. TELLER. If this bill can be voted on shortly I shall not object to its consideration, but otherwise I am going to object to it.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I will not say a word.

Mr. TELLER. If anybody wants to say anything, I shall not object at present.

Mr. BLAINE. I will say only a very few words, especially as I do not see the honorable Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Carpenter] in his seat. When this bill was up yesterday that Senator made some remarks which struck me as being of a character that ought not to go at least without answer, if not contradiction. One particular declaration arrested my attention at the time. The honorable Senator, who is known throughout the country as an able lawyer, and therefore his words are taken as having weight on any question of law or Constitution, made the declaration—

When I read it I almost thought my friend the Senator from Missouri had made the speech. Listen to what Carpenter said:

"No matter how important the subject of education may be, it is not a subject committed to this Government, and unless committed by express words or by reasonable implication we have no control over it, we have no right to further it, to hinder it, or to do anything whatever in regard to it."

That is a very good State-rights statement coming from Mr. Carpenter on that side of the Chamber, showing there was no politics in education then and there is none now. Mr. Blaine goes on to say:

He objected to diffusing information in regard to education beyond the District of Columbia, and the Senator, with an air of absolute conclusiveness, pronounced it to be wholly beyond the constitutional power of Congress to do it.

Just as the Senator from Missouri says now. Mr. Blaine continues:

I stated at the time that some of the notable framers of the Constitution of the Union did not take the same view as the honorable Senator from Wisconsin. Twice in General Washington's annual messages to Congress he recommended a national university.

Senator Blaine then read the same passage from General Washington which has been read by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] on the floor. Then, continuing his comment, Mr. Blaine says:

And yet the honorable Senator from Wisconsin makes the declaration I read just now, in the very face of the fact that Congress for the last thirty years has been largely aiding in maintaining an institution which does not stop even at diffusing knowledge among the citizens of the United States; which does not stop at the District of Columbia, where he says we are wholly stopped; it does not even stop at all the Territories of the Union, including the States thereof, but its object is the "diffusion and increase of knowledge among men;" and I think within the last thirty years we have given a very large sum to the Smithsonian Institution for that special object.

Mr. Blaine concluded by saying:

I merely rose to say that the remark of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin was not, in my judgment, good law or good Constitution, and it certainly is not in accordance with the practice of the Government ever since its foundation.

Thereupon the vote was taken and the yeas and nays are here recorded. There were thirty-one Senators who voted for Mr. Blaine's construction of the Constitution. There were seventeen Senators who voted with Mr. Carpenter and for the doctrine of the Senator from Missouri at this time, but I confess that a look at the roll-call surprises and troubles me. Voting with Mr. Blaine and for the principle which I now think correct I find the Senators from South Carolina, Mr. BUTLER and Mr. HAMPTON, Mr. HARRIS, Mr. MCPHERSON, Mr. MAXEY, and Mr. VEST. Sir, I like to be in that company. These names are good authority. I am strongly attached to every one of these gentlemen. I find no fault with them for voting for this National Educational Association, and may I not ask their charity for me while I vote the same way now?

Mr. BUTLER. Will my friend allow me to ask him whether that bill organizing a national education society pretended to interfere with any of the domestic concerns of any of the States?

Mr. VOORHEES. It did not, and if the bill before the Senate, as I have already said, interfered in the slightest degree with the management of the school system of your State by your State authorities I would not vote for it. I vote for it simply as a donation, to enable you to do what you can not accomplish with your own insufficient means.

Mr. BUTLER. According to my construction of the language of this bill my friend certainly will not vote for it, for I think it does that very thing.

Mr. VOORHEES. That is a question of construction. I am very decidedly of a different opinion. But I hold in my hand another act of Congress on the same subject. Here is an act passed March 2, 1867, entitled "An act to establish a department of education." This act was approved March 2, 1867, and makes "a Department of Education." I have not time to dwell on its details, and I only cite it to show how often and how fully the power now denied has been exercised.

The Senator from Missouri will pardon me another allusion which I know will gratify him and also the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. The Senator from Kansas filled this Hall with sorrowful complaints a few weeks ago on account of sick cattle in his State. He now opposes this educational bill. He asked for $25,000 to cure and care for his cattle, and he finally got $50,000. The Senator from Missouri, though somewhat reluctantly I think, at last heard the lowing of those suffering herds and voted for the $50,000. His ears are now closed to the cry of the children, white and black, throughout the South, but the bleating of calves, the bawling of cows, and the bellowing of bulls in Kansas, with here and there a sound from the western counties of Missouri, struck on his sympathetic ear and reached his tender heart. The question of power stood not in his way then, and the money of this Government flowed out for the purpose of healing the feet and the mouths of stricken cattle. I voted with the Senator from Missouri then, and I only regret that he and the Senator from Kansas find it more difficult to vote for this measure of relief to human beings than I did in voting for their measure to relieve the herds of the prairies.

I wish next to notice a very extraordinary circumstance connected with the very able and brilliant speech of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. He commenced, it will be remembered, on Friday last but did not finish, and resumed the next day. Before he resumed his speech, however, on Saturday he introduced a bill which is the most splendid illustration of the difference between preaching and practicing strict construction I have ever known. It fell upon my mind with very peculiar force. The Senator, while in the middle of a speech denying the power under the Constitution to aid schools in the States, introduced a bill entitled "A bill for the creation of a silk-culture bureau and the establishment of silk-culture stations." I will not offend the intelligence of the Senate by asking what enumerated power of the Constitution authorizes a silk-culture bureau in this Government.

I do not say that the bill is necessarily unconstitutional under my construction, but if the Senator from Alabama is right in his opposition to the pending measure, then his silk-culture-bureau bill is the most unconstitutional proposition ever read in the Senate Chamber.

Let us see what it is: "It provides that such a bureau shall be established as one of the bureaus of the Agricultural Department, and shall embrace in its organization five silk-culture stations, to be established as follows: one for the North Atlantic States, location Pennsylvania; one for the South Atlantic States, in Florida; one for the Gulf States, in Alabama; one for the Northwestern States, in Iowa; and one for the Pacific States, in California. The object of the establishment of the bureau and the several silk-culture stations it declares to be experimentally to raise silk-worms"——

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will indulge me for a moment——

Mr. VOORHEES. Wait until I read this through.

Mr. MORGAN. I want to relieve the Senator of unnecessary agitation by saying that the RECORD shows I introduced the bill by request.

Mr. VORHEES. "Study their nature and the means of improving their productive qualities; to investigate the diseases to which they are subject; to cultivate and by all means deemed proper to encourage the cultivation of the plants adapted for feeding silk-worms, and to experiment in silk, with a view of ascertaining the best appliances and methods for conducting the various operations of preparing the raw silk. It provides for an appropriation of $150,000 for carrying out the objects of the bill." And it provides a salary of $2,400 a year for the superintendent. I know the RECORD shows that the Senator introduced the bill "by request." If he means by that to say he is not in favor of the bill that will end all discussion upon it, but as he is silent, and in the absence of such a disclaimer he must pardon me for pointing out the fact that he has answered his elaborate two days' argument by introducing such a measure. I am contending for a power in this Government which will enable it to aid the children of the South to read the Lord's Prayer, and the Senator answers back with a bill to make silk. Silk is a luxury of the rich, and when I make my plea on behalf of the poor, he erects a silk-culture bureau before my face. When I vote for a bill which will enable the rising generations of the South to read the Sermon on the Mount, he replies with a bill on the subject of silk-worms, cocoons, and mulberry leaves!

Sir, I look hopefully to the future of the South. I regard this movement in the cause of education of infinite importance and full of future glory. The conduct of the Southern people themselves gives assurance that the movement will be executed in good faith and will bear precious fruits. No people on the globe, with their country devastated by war, their cities sacked and burned, their society shocked and demoralized, their social and industrial institutions torn down and destroyed, have ever recovered themselves so well, with so much manhood, force, and rapidity, as the people of the South. With this measure now to aid their own noble efforts there is a day just before them such as they themselves have not dreamed of.

You Senators around me, and I too, with hair growing gray, will not live to see the full fruition of our work; we will not live to see the entire fullness of the great harvest of blessings which will flow from this legislation; but our children and our children's children to the latest generations will rise up and call blessed those who provided for them this great and munificent bounty. The business enterprise of the North and West is penetrating the South, and my desire is that light and knowledge shall also bless her people of every race and hue. I hold in my hand an article giving an account of the enterprise of Western and Northern men in the South during this present year, and the reading of it gave me so much pleasure that I venture to ask the Senate to hear it:

PROGRESS OF THE SOUTH—FIGURES WHICH SHOW A REMARKABLE DEGREE OF ENTERPRISE.

One of the striking features of the industrial progress of the South is the immense amount of Northern and Western capital seeking investment there. The Southern people themselves are also displaying remarkable energy in establishing new enterprises and in building up their own section.

In what States has this increase taken place, and in what branches of manufacturing is most progress being made, are two questions of particular interest, the answer to which will show that the entire South is sharing in this improvement and that almost every industry is represented. Our figures show that in the amount of capital stock of enterprises organized this year Kentucky takes the lead of all the Southern States with $6,851,000, while following not far behind comes Alabama with $5,210,000, and of the two we think Alabama's represents more actual money and less paper only than Kentucky's.—Baltimore Manufacturers' Record.

I would say to the Senator from Kentucky, whether he is for a tariff for revenue only or for revenue with incidental protection, the enterprise and the labor of the world will find the coal-beds and the iron-ore of Kentucky and all the other Southern States and dig them out, and give new life and wealth to that section.

But to proceed with this most interesting exhibit:

Alabama is making wonderful progress. It is really marvelous to note day after day the long list of new enterprises started in that State. They embrace almost every industry. It is true that the boundless coal and iron resources of the State are attracting great attention, resulting in the organization since January 1 of a number of heavy mining and iron-furnace companies. But other industries are also flourishing. A very extensive cotton-mill, large machine-shops, rolling-mills, planing-mills, and similar enterprises help to swell the list.

Virginia ranks third in the list with $3,830,000, represented by cotton-mills, saw-mills, rolling-mills, nail-works, mines, furnaces, and numerous other industries, while Texas comes fourth with $3,593,000. The list of new enterprises in Texas includes almost all industrial branches except cotton manufactures, and in that line she does not seem to be making any progress, notwithstanding her fine advantages for cotton-mills. Georgia is fifth on the list with $2,040,000, and Maryland sixth with $2,014,000. North Carolina is making splendid progress, and in every part of the State new factories are the order of the day. Cotton, woolen, flour, and saw mills, tobacco factories, mining companies, and machine-shops are among the new enterprises started, the aggregate capital being $1,227,000. Tennessee shows up with $846,000, made up rather by many industries of moderate extent than by a few heavy concerns. Virginia counts up for the first two months of the year $916,000, South Carolina $904,000, while the other States figure up something less than $500,000 each.

Notwithstanding the depression in the cotton-goods trade of the world, the South is steadily pushing on in the building of new cotton-mills. Among the enterprises of this kind now under way is a newly organized company to build a $175,000 mill at Columbia, Tenn.; a $200,000 mill in Durham, N. C.; a $50,000 mill for Trenton, Tenn.; a $200,000 mill in Dalton, Ga.; one to cost $84,000 in Griffin, Ga.; a $300,000 mill in Roanoke, Va.; and an additional mill to cost about $100,000 by a Rome (Ga.) factory company; while the company at Columbus, Ga., now running about 40,000 spindles, proposes to put up a new $1,000,000 mill. A company will build a $300,000 mill at Darlington, S. C., to be finished in the fall, and another of equal cost is under construction at Newberry, in the same State; while Fayetteville, N. C., and one or two other places in that State, will also soon have new cotton-mills.

At Rockingham, N. C.; Lowell, in the same State; Danville, Va.; Montgomery, Ala.; Selma, Ala.; and Birmingham, Ala., new factories or extensions are being constructed. The aggregate cost of the above-mentioned mills will be about $3,250,000. These mills will add 100,000 or more spindles to the number now in the South.

This article shows that industry and wealth are spreading their energies over the face of the whole South in a most remarkable degree. Is it inappropriate that I cite this fact in connection with a bill for education in the same section? If our young and business men are going into that beautiful country to start coal-mines, put up iron-mills and cotton factories to develop its material resources, is it not incumbent on us from all sections to promote there the cause of education? You need skilled labor. The negro is most naturally an agricultural laborer. You need educated men to enter your manufacturing establishments. Looking at the Senator from Mississippi, as he is directly before me, I am reminded that in the last census it is stated that Mississippi alone, under full and scientific cultivation and development, can produce the entire 6,000,000 bales of cotton which the whole South now produces. I would gladly live to see the people of the South realize the wealth and power there is for them in that great cotton belt running from Eastern North Carolina to Western Texas. When the hum of machinery is heard throughout that vast region, when manufactories are built in the cotton fields, when the production and the manufacture combine to make the profits, with no transportation account to pay, then will the South be the wealthiest portion of this Union, if not of the world.

Sir, the scholarly Senator from Texas who sits before me [Mr. COKE] ventured to predict that the bill now being considered would be a Pandora's box to the South. Who was Pandora, and what was her box? There are different versions, but according to my memory of Grecian mythology she was the "all-endowed" beautiful woman to whom was intrusted a box filled with winged blessings for mankind. Her curiosity tempted her to open it, when all the blessings escaped and flew away with the single exception of Hope. There are other accounts as to the contents of her box, but I choose to adopt this, and to say that if this bill only brings you hope it will not be in vain. Hope is earth's greatest comfort. But the other blessings in the bill will not fly away. They will remain in the shape of school-houses and colleges, lighting your hilltops and illumining your valleys, and securing a higher plane of existence and enjoyment for the present and coming generations. Rather will this measure when it becomes a law be to the people of the South as the shield of Achilles to the Grecian warrior, a measure of safety, defense, power, and bearing with it every element of beauty, refinement, wealth, culture, domestic pleasure, and Christian grace which the cultivation of letters and the promotion of the sciences and arts can bestow upon a great and upright people. The shield which Thetis bore from Vulcan to Achilles before the walls of Troy was emblazoned all over with opulent cities, prosperous villages, smiling plains—

> Rich crops waving for harvest,
> Reapers, reaping the crop with the bright hooks grasped in their right hands vineyards with "the dark grapes hanging in clusters;" herds of straight-horned, beautiful oxen; council chambers of high debate; scenes of domestic happiness; marriage feasts, with music, dance, and song; and

> All the constellations that gem, like a diadem, night's brow;
> Pleiades, and Hyades, and the glory of mighty Orion.

Sir, as the shield of the hero was an emblem of the power, the glory, and the civilization of Greece, so to my mind is the measure now before the Senate a symbol and a sign of the future prosperity of the South and of the general welfare of the whole country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, a great deal has been said here with respect to the power of Congress to enact this bill. In the few remarks that I addressed to the Senate when this debate opened I gave clear expression to my opinion in respect of that power. I have not any more doubt about it now than I had then and I am not going to repeat myself, but what I want to say now is that the Senate on former occasions has indicated what its power was over subjects of this character.

I do not complain that public men shall change their opinions about constitutional power. I never cite the vote of any Senator here and parade it before the body or the country to show that he is inconsistent. I do not think there is any inconsistency whatever in a public man voting at one time a little different from what he did at another; but I say when this great body establishes a precedent of power by its votes as an entirety, it is always legitimate to refer to it as a source of information. The Supreme Court of the United States would feel humiliated if in the discussion of a great legal question a lawyer were to bring before it one of its own decisions in point and say: "This question, your honors, is res adjudicata; you decided so and so in a previous case, and that is the question now before the court." Of course the court sometimes overrules itself, but always with some degree of humiliation. I do not argue that a political body should not be bound down to strict rules of judicial res adjudicata, but after the Senate has committed itself on this question of power, as I claim that it has, it is a little too late in the day for any member of it to ridicule the views of those who entertain the opinion we do.

Now, Mr. President, I hold in my hand a bill that came from the House of Representatives in 1878 to aid the blind to see, or at least to improve those who were deprived of the great power of vision, by helping a great institution located in Kentucky, the State of my friend on my left [Mr. BECK]. It was thought that the interests of that great institution might be subserved and the interests of the blind all over the Union promoted if it could get $250,000 out of the tax money of the people of the United States. They did not ask that it should come from the proceeds of the public lands; there was no disguise about it. This great institution created in the interest of this unfortunate class of people wanted help and they appealed to this great power. The bill passed the other House and came here. I say in my place in the Senate to-day that every constitutional objection that can possibly be urged—I will not go any further—to the bill now before the Senate could be urged to the bill that I hold in my hand and which passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). The Senator from Florida will suspend for a moment. It becomes the duty of the Chair to remind him that the debate is proceeding by unanimous consent. Under the agreement it is to proceed after 3 o'clock under the five-minute rule.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I ask, with the permission of the Senate, that the bill may be read.

Mr. CALL. I yield my time to my colleague.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President——

Mr. MORGAN. If that is to be done, I think it is a violation of the understanding of the Senate. I have been attacked here by two Senators this morning in extenso and furioso, and I have not asked the Senate to give me any time to reply to them. I will take occasion to do that when the measure of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] comes up, which I expect to move as a substitute for this bill before we get through. I object to any Senator's time being extended.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The Senator has himself taken up so little time heretofore in discussing the bill——

Mr. MORGAN. And some Senators have been absent from this District during much of the time that the discussion has been going on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama expresses an unwillingness to consent to an extension of the time of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I wanted to ask that the bill be read and that the record of two bills passed by the Senate might be laid before the body.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] is, under the rules, entitled to the floor. The bill will be read if there be no objection.

Mr. BLAIR. Have I the floor?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida has the floor.

Mr. ALLISON. What becomes of the understanding had in the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair, as the older Senators all know, by the rules of the Senate has never been understood as authorized to enforce an understanding, it depending upon the consent of the members of the Senate. Therefore the Chair is obliged to hold that the Senator from Florida is entitled to the floor and may speak, under the rule, as long as he thinks fit.

Mr. HARRIS. Has not the five-minute rule become a rule of the Senate in its application to this bill, and is it not as much the duty of the Chair to enforce it as to enforce any other rule of the body?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not so understand it under the constant practice of the Senate.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I do not wish to take advantage of the ruling of the Chair, although it is entirely right, and I shall not proceed without unanimous consent.

Mr. BLAIR. Perhaps I can make a suggestion which will relieve us of difficulty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida has taken his seat, and the Chair recognizes the Senator from New Hampshire to speak on the pending amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator from Florida will pass me the data he would like to give the Senate I will occupy my five minutes in placing them before the Senate.

Mr. CALL. If the Senator from New Hampshire will allow me——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BLAIR. I do not like to yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire does not yield.

Mr. BLAIR. In one moment I will conclude.

Mr. CALL. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida rises to a point of order. He will state it.

Mr. CALL. I was recognized by the Chair immediately on the conclusion of my colleague's remarks and took the floor.

Mr. BLAIR. I yield the floor to the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL].

Mr. CALL. I yielded the floor to my colleague. I desire to know if it is not in order that he shall proceed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not so understand it. Under the practice of the Senate every Senator must speak in his own time.

Mr. CALL. I submit to the Chair if a Senator takes the floor and is recognized, has he not the right upon the appeal of another Senator to be interrupted by him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks he has.

Mr. CALL. That was the fact. I gave way to my colleague. The question is whether he had the right to proceed and whether I had the right to do it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not think that the Senator from Florida who is now addressing the Chair can rise and yield his time to his colleague. The order of the Senate, by unanimous consent, was that the debate should be governed by the rule about appropriation bills, which is to confine debate on amendments thereto to five minutes by any Senator on the pending motion. That, therefore, does not allow several Senators to speak for fifteen or thirty minutes. The Chair decided that the Senator from Florida in front of the Chair [Mr. JONES] was still entitled to the floor until he surrendered it in his own right; but he did surrender it, and the Chair recognized the Senator from New Hampshire, who is now entitled to the floor.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator from New Hampshire permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BLAIR. I desire to occupy the floor for the purpose of placing before the Senate the matter which the Senator from Florida desired to have stated and for no other purpose. Since I have but five minutes in any event, I do not like to have the time otherwise occupied. If the Senator from Florida desires me to do it, I will do so. If he does not, I will yield the floor and he can introduce that matter at some later stage of the debate.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I said distinctly to the Senate that I did not wish to take advantage of the ruling of the Chair and proceed against the understanding of the body except by unanimous consent. I wish to speak but for a few moments. If that is not conceded to me, I yield the floor to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BLAIR. Will it not suit the Senator from Florida better at a later stage of the debate, upon some of the amendments, when he will be entitled to take the floor to introduce the matter himself that he wishes to present?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Very well.

Mr. BLAIR. Then I yield the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, on Saturday last the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] advertised the fact that he intended to proceed this morning to powder the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] and myself into the smallest atoms possible. I have not lost any sleep on account of that threat and do not know that I suffer any injury in mind or body at present. It is not the first time that the war has not come up to the manifesto. The Senator's speech to-day was simply a succession of brilliant tropes and figures and second-hand rhetoric which never touched at all the measure before the Senate.

I can not congratulate him upon the fact that his attack upon me consisted of a very tawdry imitation of the attack made by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] the other day upon the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. It was hardly worthy of the oratorical or rhetorical brilliancy which usually accompanies the efforts of the Senator from Indiana. One would have supposed from the manifesto of Saturday and from his feeble attempt at classic brilliancy to-day that he was attempting to go back to the days of the Homeric era when as schoolboys we used to read of Tydides.

> Hark to Tydides rushing from afar,
> As with his golden chariot wheels he thunders to the war.

Sir, there was once in this country a distinguished statesman who obtained the sobriquet of the Moses, who should lead the negroes to the promised land, and now his successor comes from Indiana, is a second Moses to lead the pickaninnies of the South to country school-houses in order to learn the doctrine of true democracy.

Whatever my views may have been, they are certainly as consistent as the political course of the Senator from Indiana and the speech he has delivered here to-day with the speeches he has made heretofore. I did vote for the resolution of the Senator from Kansas appropriating $50,000 to assist the authorities of Kansas with their consent to extirpate the disease that threatened the cattle of the whole Union, and I believed then and believe now that I was clearly as a lawyer and as a statesman inside of the decision of the Supreme Court in Gibbons vs. Ogden, where it was decided that the authorities of the United States could assist the authorities of a State in exercising health and quarantine laws, because the general power was vested in the Government to regulate commerce. In the Kansas case I believe that the power to regulate commerce among the States brought that resolution within the constitutional power.

But, Mr. President, why talk about the Constitution? Why sing hymns when we have had a constitutional funeral such as has been solemnized throughout this debate? I have but this to say: I will never again undertake to stand here and make an argument upon the Constitution and appeal to this side of the Chamber to sustain me either upon precedents coming from statesmen or upon opinions of the Supreme Court. We have heard of the monkeys in council who sat in grave and deliberate judgment upon a question of state until some mischievous wag threw in their midst a handful of nuts, when the council broke up in the most "admired disorder." One hundred and five million dollars has been thrown into this council of state and the monkeys are grabbing in every direction, and if that part of the menagerie from Indiana does not get its part of the nuts it will not be the fault of the distinguished Senator who has spoken to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. HOAR. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LOGAN and Mr. SAULSBURY. Let the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 3, it is proposed to strike out "ten" before "years" and insert "eight;" so as to read:

> That for eight years next after the passage of this act there shall be annually appropriated from the money in the Treasury the following sums, to wit.

And in line 5, after the words "to wit," to strike out:

> The first year the sum of $15,000,000, the second year the sum of $14,000,000, the third year the sum of $13,000,000, and thereafter a sum diminished $1,000,000 yearly from the sum last appropriated, until ten annual appropriations shall have been made, when all appropriations under this act shall cease.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

> The first year the sum of $7,000,000, the second year the sum of $10,000,000, the third year the sum of $15,000,000, the fourth year the sum of $13,000,000, the fifth year the sum of $11,000,000, the sixth year the sum of $9,000,000, the seventh year the sum of $7,000,000, the eighth year the sum of $5,000,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. These two amendments were by previous understanding agreed to be submitted as one, and the Chair will put the question on the two branches together if there be no objection.

Mr. LOGAN. Before the vote is taken on this amendment I desire to say a word. I shall vote for the amendment, but in doing so I wish to place upon the record my opinion at least that the amount fixed by the amendment as now proposed will not be adequate for that which is desired to be accomplished by the bill. For the purpose of aiding and assisting in the education of the illiterate children of the whole country certainly $7,000,000 for the first year to be applied as a fund for the education of the number which the statistics show require aid can not be sufficient. The amount that is appropriated annually by several of the different States of the Union for common schools within their own limits is greater than the amount here for the aid of all the schools. My own State appropriates $7,000,000 per annum for common-school purposes. My judgment is that this sum is totally inadequate to accomplish the object that we desire.

In proposing the amendment that I did the other day, which was voted down by a very large vote in the Senate, I believed that the amount commencing and running up to $20,000,000 and then decreasing annually until the last amount will be $6,000,000 would have accomplished something in the direction that we all seem to be moving. But the opinion of the Senate is otherwise, and that it may not be considered that I shall obstruct in the slightest degree any measure that is calculated to aid and assist in the education of the children of our country, and especially when it is the education of the poor and unfortunate in many parts of our country who are entitled at least to receive aid and benefit from somewhere, I shall vote for this amendment if it shall seem to meet the judgment of a considerable majority of the Senate after having stated that I do not believe that it will accomplish the object that we desire shall be accomplished.

The aggregate amount proposed is $77,000,000 in eight years. Let us reflect for one moment. It is $77,000,000 to be distributed through eight years to aid and assist in the education of all the children of the country. Almost $75,000,000 is expended annually in this country now for the education of the children, and you propose to take the amount that is absolutely necessary to be expended in one year and distribute it over eight years; and can you imagine that this is going to accomplish much in educating the unfortunate children of this country? I do not believe it; but at the same time——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him, although I do not know that I ought to do so in his five minutes?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. The Southern States raise only about $14,000,000 now.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand so.

Mr. HOAR. In the year when $15,000,000 are distributed about $11,000,000 will be given to those States which now raise $14,000,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must remind the Senator from Illinois that according to the understanding his time has expired, but he is still entitled to the floor under the rules.

Mr. LOGAN. I shall not claim it. I merely desired to make these remarks in order that I might give my views in reference to what may be accomplished by the amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. I have marked here the four States that pay over $7,000,000 annually for educational purposes.

Mr. LOGAN. If I may be allowed, I will merely call attention to a memorandum given me by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR]. The school fund annually of Illinois is $7,858,414; of New York, $10,923,402; of Ohio, $8,133,622; of Pennsylvania, $7,994,705. Those States appropriate annually that amount, and the amount is increasing annually; and can we believe that the amount here proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts will accomplish our object?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK (when Mr. HALE'S name was called). I received a note from the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] stating that he is necessarily absent to-day. I am paired with him on all amendments to this bill. On this one he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. HAMPTON (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY], but I am informed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], who was to decide as to the pair, that he would vote "yea" on this amendment. I shall therefore vote; I vote "yea."

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. I do not know how he would vote on this question. I should vote "nay" if he were present.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. KENNA. I wish to announce that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH].

Mr. LAMAR. I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON]. If he were here, I would vote "nay" on the bill; and therefore I shall not vote on this question.

Mr. JONES, of Florida (after having voted in the negative). I desire to withdraw my vote, and announce my pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote will be withdrawn if there be no objection.

Mr. MANDERSON. I wish to announce that on the bill and on all the amendments my colleague [Mr. VAN WYCK] is paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN].

Mr. MORGAN (after having voted in the negative). Since I have voted I have arranged a pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. WALKER], who is absent, and I withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote will be withdrawn if there be no objection.

Mr. LOGAN. Inasmuch as I see on both sides of the Chamber the desire to have the amount reduced, I shall vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 38, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—38.

Mr. HOAR. I now move to amend the second section by striking out, after the word "States," in line 6, the words "and until otherwise provided such computation shall be made according to the last preceding published census of the United States," and inserting:

Such computation shall be made according to the census of 1880.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I now move to amend the eleventh section of the bill by striking out all after the word "child," in line 7, in the following words:

An opportunity for common-school and, so far as may be, of industrial education; and to this end existing public schools, not sectarian in character, may be aided, and new ones may be established, as may be deemed best in the several localities:

And to insert:

Without distinction of race or color, an equal opportunity for education. The term "school district" shall include all cities, towns, parishes, and all corporations clothed by law with the power of maintaining common schools.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to this amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to say a few words in favor of the amendment. I appreciate the force of the arguments which have been advanced by many Senators, whether as arguments upon the Constitution or as addressed to the sound discretion of the General Government. I am not myself in favor of using the taxing power to compel the States to pay a sum of money for common-school purposes which shall be returned to them on condition that they manage their common schools in a certain way. Without questioning the power in this particular case, I think we shall all, on both sides of the Chamber, be unanimously of the opinion that it is a power which it is inexpedient to exercise. I am in favor of adding to the ordinary branches taught in our common schools in my State a provision for what is called industrial education within reasonable limits, for teaching the pupils so to apply scientific knowledge that it may be made useful in the practical arts of life. That is what I understand by industrial education; but that is not, to say the least, universal in the common schools of this country. To compel a State to raise its share or any share of $100,000,000, perhaps all it can raise for school purposes might be taxed in that way within the limits of its ability to pay, and to return the State's portion of that money from the General Government only on condition that it manages its schools in a certain way does seem to me an interference with the management of the schools, whether it be constitutional or not.

The bill when this is stricken out will contain no condition whatever except such conditions as are essential to make it certain, or as shall seem to Congress essential to make it certain, that the money shall reach its object. It is true this section is left then that the money shall be used in the school districts, and there is a provision later in the bill for teaching reading, writing, and geography; but as was very aptly and felicitously said by the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] the other day, those are not conditions imposed upon the States in substance; they are mere definitions. Instruction in reading, writing, and geography is a definition of the common-school system of this country. There probably is not a common school in the country in which those things are not taught. The bill permits the State to make an application beyond that if it sees fit, but it nowhere requires it as a condition.

My amendment strikes out the provision requiring the State to apply the money as far as may be for industrial education and inserts language so as to read: "thereby giving to each child, without distinction of race or color, an equal opportunity for education." Then it transfers to this section from another section, where the term "school district" is used, the definition which the bill now contains of the school district; that is, that it shall include the corporations, of whatever name, by which the States exercise this power.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, there are one or two observations which I desire to make in regard to this amendment. In the first place, I do not see what reason there is for striking out the clause which allows the money to be expended in "existing public schools not sectarian in character." That provision is stricken out. It seems to me that the public money of the United States ought to be distributed among schools not sectarian in their character. I think that phrase or its equivalent in some form should be retained.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me; the clause which is stricken out was intended to authorize giving this money to schools which were not common schools, not belonging to the general common-school system, if there were public colleges and things of that kind, and therefore if that was to be done sectarian schools ought to be prohibited. But as the bill is now limited to the common-school system of the States, in which in no instance in the country is there any sectarianism allowed, that does not become necessary.

Mr. SHERMAN. Where is the provision in the section that confines it to common schools?

Mr. HOAR. The language is that the moneys "shall be used in the school districts of the several States and Territories," that school district being the city, town, parish, or corporation clothed by law with the power of maintaining common schools, which is the definition.

Mr. SHERMAN. But here is the trouble. The Senator moves in line 7 to strike out the words "an opportunity for common-school and, so far as may be, of industrial education." I desire to see that clause preserved, and made to read "an opportunity for education in common schools not sectarian in character."

Mr. LOGAN. It ought to provide for common schools alone.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is what I propose. Therefore I hope the Senate will not strike out that language in the section, but leave it so that it will read "thereby giving to each State an opportunity for common-school education not sectarian in character."

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will allow me, we agree in our opinions absolutely; there is no difference. I think I have accomplished what the Senator desires; but the fact that he does not think so is enough to make me desire to go further in expressing it. Suppose we add in the second line so as to make it read "shall be used in the school districts of the several States and Territories for common schools only in such way as to provide," &c. That will accomplish it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the words "not sectarian in character" ought to accompany "common schools," so as to make it read "an equal opportunity for education in common schools not sectarian in character."

Mr. HOAR. But there are no common schools sectarian in character, and can not be from the necessities of the case. It does not seem to me that it is worth while to use that language. It is like the suggestion as to a law against parricide. Nobody can suppose that a common school in any State or Territory within eight years from this time will become a sectarian school.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is well enough to guard against that. Such a provision is contained in the school laws of nearly all the States, and I think it ought to be kept here. I know that there exist in some of the large cities common schools, perhaps not by that name, but essentially common schools for the very lowest grade of learning, that may become sectarian in character.

Mr. HOAR. I have no objection to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it ought to be included.

Mr. HOAR. Let my amendment be adopted as I have stated it, and then let the Senator move, or I will if he pleases, to insert the words after the word "Territories," in line 3.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Massachusetts has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. PENDLETON. Let it be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be again reported.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. It connection with that, and as part of the same, the Senator from Massachusetts says he will accept so far as he is concerned an amendment in the second line, so as to read "that the money distributed under the provisions of this act shall be used in common schools not sectarian in character in the school districts of the several States and Territories," the words to be added coming in after the word "used," in line 2.

Mr. HOAR. That is a separate amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. But it is part of the same—"shall be used in common schools not sectarian in character."

Mr. HOAR. "Only in common schools."

Mr. LOGAN. Let it read "shall be used only in common schools not sectarian in character."

Mr. SHERMAN. I will add the word "only;" so as to read, "shall be used only in common schools not sectarian in character." That is already in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In what line does the Senator from Ohio propose his amendment to come in?

Mr. SHERMAN. In line 2, after the word "used."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is an amendment in a separate part of the section not now under consideration.

Mr. SHERMAN. But it is simply a transposition of the parts stricken out below. Part of the words stricken out below are preserved by the amendment I suggest. The same words are to be found in lines 8 and 9. It has been understood that these words should be inserted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio being considered a part of the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. PENDLETON. We have not been able to hear my colleague upon this side of the Chamber. If there is a necessity that I should do it I will move to strike out any word there in order that he may tell us what it is that he desires. I have not been able to hear him.

Mr. HOAR. The vote had better be taken separately on the two questions.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will explain my amendment, then. I find in the section as it now stands, lines 8 and 9, that the fund is limited to the support of common schools "not sectarian in character." It is proposed to strike out and to insert words to which I have no objection, "without distinction of race or color." I propose to transfer the words "common schools not sectarian in character" and to put these words in line 2, so as to read:

That the moneys distributed under the provisions of this act shall be used only for common schools not sectarian in character, in the school districts, &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment is not, as the Chair thinks, now in order, the Senator from Massachusetts declining to modify his amendment, and he could not do it without unanimous consent, as it is in a separate part of the section. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. CALL. I wish to ask the attention of the Senate to the fact that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts prevents the use of any part of the money for industrial education.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me. It leaves the States at perfect liberty to apply it in that way, but it does not compel them to use it for industrial education unless they desire.

Mr. CALL. I should have said that the amendment did not, but the bill with the words "industrial education" stricken out, as I understand it, limits the use of this money to common schools, to teaching reading, writing, and such branches as are known under the general term of a common-school education.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me, it provides expressly in another part of the bill that the States may teach such other things as they choose in their common schools.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I have not given any attention to the details of the bill because I am opposed to the bill upon principle. I am opposed to it as a scheme, and I have paid but very little attention to the details of the bill. I shall vote against the bill, and I am inclined to vote against every amendment that is offered to it. I understand that certain amendments have been fixed up in a caucus for the purpose of being ingrafted on the bill. If that is the case I have no disposition to aid in the caucus scheme in reference to this measure. I am not disposed to consider that a matter fixed up in reference to a bill that is wrong in itself can be right. I do not think that the Republican caucus can ingraft any provision upon a bill which I think is obnoxious and wrong from beginning to end that is right. I am free to confess my views of this whole scheme. It makes very little difference to me whether the matter is perfected or becomes more obnoxious by amendments that may be offered to it. I shall content myself therefore either with not voting at all upon the amendments or voting against those which I understand were fixed up in a caucus.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move to insert the words I proposed a moment ago. In section 11, line 2, after the word "used," I move to insert the words "only for common schools not sectarian in character;" so as to read:

That the moneys distributed under the provisions of this act shall be used only for common schools not sectarian in character in the school districts of the several States and Territories, &c.

Mr. GEORGE. There is no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to inquire whether the object of that is to exclude Catholic communities that may have chartered rights to establish common schools from the benefit of this fund? As I understand the amendment, it can have no other purpose, because corporations, cities, parishes, and other institutions of a municipal character authorized by the laws of the respective States to conduct common schools are included in this provision of the bill. They are provided for, and it is enacted that the money shall be paid to them.

There are Catholic institutions, Catholic corporations, and perhaps municipalities within the States under the control of the Catholic Church, and we very well understand that that great denomination of people have for a long time been turbulent I may say, have complained a great deal that they are compelled to contribute out of their taxes to the common-school funds of the country and yet are compelled to have their children educated in those schools by teachers whom they regard as not being better than pagans. If the purpose of the amendment is to drive the Catholics into a corner I should like to understand it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no purpose except to preserve a clause that I believe is in the laws of nearly all the States of the Union. This amendment is not aimed at the Catholics, nor at the Methodists, nor at the Presbyterians, nor at any form of religious worship. It simply declares that in the distribution and use of the public money, both State and national, the money shall be disbursed and used for non-sectarian schools, not to propagate any faith, not even the Christian faith; not to propagate Catholicism, nor Presbyterianism, nor any other creed.

This same provision, I may say, is contained in the laws, I think, of nearly every State. If there is any common-school system in which the Catholics have exclusive control, I do not know of it. If there is any common-school system in which the Methodists have any control, I do not know of any. The amendment simply declares the general principle that the money shall be used in the common schools free from sectarian influence.

Mr. FARLEY. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. FARLEY. What common schools are sectarian in their character? I do not know of any common schools in the United States that are thought to be sectarian.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think there are any, but the words are found in the general laws.

Mr. FARLEY. My question leads to this point: If there are no common schools that are sectarian in their character, why incorporate the amendment in the bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. In the first place, because it is in the bill as it stands; it is in every school law. I believe myself that the Catholics of this country are coming to the conclusion that many of their ideas about common schools are erroneous. I know of my own knowledge that in many communities all the children, Catholics as well as Protestants, go to the common schools, and that certainly ought to be the rule.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio what would be the effect if the board of school commissioners in any district or in any county should determine that they would have a Protestant Bible taught in that school, whether that would be regarded as a sectarian school?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is a question I do not wish to answer. We had a great deal of controversy in our courts in Ohio about that, and our courts I think held that that could not be prescribed by the trustees.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think that the amendment of the Senator from Ohio is necessary, because I think the idea is expressed in the bill; but if a Senator of his great experience and intelligence thinks the bill should be made more clear by inserting the language he suggests, I shall myself defer to his opinion and vote for it.

We have, I suppose, as large a proportion of Catholics in the State and in the city where I reside as in any community in the United States, with scarcely an exception, and there is no class of our community that, as a rule, are more stanch friends of our common-school system. The Catholic members of the school board sit side by side with the Protestants, urging the most liberal expenditure and the most careful supervision, and, with very few exceptions indeed, the members of that great and influential sect prefer that the common-school system shall be kept from any sectarian or priestly influence.

Mr. BLAIR. May I make a suggestion that I think will satisfy everybody? We need to put this provision in so that the Mormons will not get any of the fund.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. It seems to me to be a work of supererogation to put an amendment of this kind on the bill There is nothing sectarian in it, I think, as it now stands.

Mr. SHERMAN. The words are in the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I am willing to accept it as it is. The Senator from Ohio has said that he does not know that any of the schools in the United States are now under sectarian influences. This overparticularity might give offense in some quarters where it would be better that none should be given. I think we can trust the disposition of this fund to the schools as they exist in the United States under the respective systems, for that I think is the purport of the bill—to give this money to the States to aid the schools as now existing.

Mr. ALLISON. The common schools.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The common schools; and it is entirely unnecessary in my opinion to incorporate a provision to provide against a contingency that can not exist, and therefore give rise to comment among religious sects that by an overexertion of power and particularity it was attempted to discriminate against them in some way. I do not think it is wise.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not know that I have a right to speak again, but I may put a question. I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio whether the courts in his State have not decided that opening the schools with the reading of a chapter in the Bible in the morning constituted the school in which that was done a sectarian school, and whether if the bill is passed with the amendment which he offers common schools could be opened in the State of Ohio by reading a chapter from the Bible without constituting them sectarian schools? I understand that that has been the decision of the courts in Ohio, and that the supreme court of that State has affirmed that the reading of a chapter from the Bible constitutes a school a sectarian school.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not so understand the decision. It was a construction upon the phraseology of the Ohio law. Without that law before me I should not like to undertake to state the decision of the court. They simply held that the trustees had no power to prescribe the reading of the Bible, if I remember correctly. My colleague, who lives in the city where the case occurred, will know much better than I. My impression is that it was a simple construction of the law of Ohio, probably differently worded from any law we have before us.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK (when his name was called). I wish to state once for all that I am paired upon this measure with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. I do not know how he would vote on any of these questions. I think I would generally vote "nay."

Mr. GORMAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] on all amendments, as well as on the bill itself.

Mr. LAMAR (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON]. He is opposed to the bill. Therefore I shall not vote on this amendment.

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. WALKER]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 32, nays 18; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. I now move the first amendment proposed by me the other day, which is to strike out all of section 3 and insert in lieu thereof what is on the desk of the Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Indiana will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all of section 3 and to insert in lieu thereof:

SEC. 3. That no State or Territory shall receive any of the benefits of this act until the governor thereof shall file with the Secretary of the Interior a statement, certified by him, showing the character of the school system in force in such State or Territory; the amount of money expended therein during the last preceding school year in the support of common schools, not including expenditures for the rent, repair, or erection of school-houses; whether any discrimination is made in the raising or distributing of the school revenues or in the school facilities afforded between the white and colored children therein, and, so far as is practicable, the sources from which such revenues were derived; the manner in which the same were apportioned to the use of the schools; the number of white and the number of colored schools; the average attendance in each class, and the length of the school term. No money shall be paid out under this act to any State or Territory that has not provided by law a system of free common schools for all of its children of school age, without distinction of color either in the raising or distributing of school revenues or in the school facilities afforded: Provided, That separate schools for white and colored children shall not be considered a violation of this condition. The Secretary of the Interior shall thereupon certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the names of the States and Territories which he finds to be entitled to share in the benefits of this act and also the amount due to each.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to this amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. I suppose Senators have generally read the amendment with sufficient care to understand its effect. As the bill was originally reported from the committee the distribution for the first year was to be made without any report at all from the States. The fund appropriated was to be distributed to all the States upon the basis of illiteracy named in the bill, without any preliminary report being required. The amendment which I proposed early in the discussion of the bill to the effect that the amount apportioned to each State should not exceed the amount which the State had given the preceding year out of its own revenues applied to common-school education made it necessary in my judgment that we should have from the State some preliminary report as to the condition of schools in the State in the first place, with a view of ascertaining from an official report whether the particular State did maintain within its limits a system of free common-schools without distinction of race or color, except (and the amendment provides for that) that a system of separate black and white schools should not be considered a distinction of race or color; and also that we might have an official report as to the amount of money which had in the preceding year been expended by the State, in order that the Secretary of the Interior in making his distribution of the amount appropriated from the public Treasury might know just how much should go to each State.

If Senators have observed the amendment they will see that it requires simply in advance the same information which in the original bill was required to be furnished by the proper officers of the State at the end of the first year and as a prerequisite to any second allotment under the bill. It does not introduce, as I think, any new conditions; it does not require any other action on the part of the State except that it requires it to be taken in advance of the first allotment in order to furnish us the basis on which this fund may be distributed.

I take it, therefore, that those who found nothing objectionable in the bill itself and in its requirements as to reports from the several States will find nothing objectionable in this amendment, which simply requires, as I have said, a preliminary report from the States upon the same matter.

I desire to suggest that the word "common," before the word "school," in line 6 in the amendment which I have proposed, should be inserted.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to call his attention to line 29 in the amendment?

Mr. HARRISON. Line 29 is not in this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. How does the Senator from Indiana modify his amendment?

Mr. HARRISON. By inserting the word "common" before the word "school," in line 6 of the amendment. The President is probably looking at the bill as printed with the amendments. I refer him to the separate print of the amendment. It corresponds with line 14 of the printed bill, "showing the character of the common-school system."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana is entitled to modify his amendment, and the Chair understands him to modify it by inserting, after the word "the" and before the word "school," in line 14 of section 3 of the last reprint, the word "common."

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. HARRISON. It has also been suggested to me—and while I do not think it necessary I yield to the suggestion—that in line 29, section 3, after the words "distinction of," the words "race or" should be inserted before "color;" so as to read "without distinction of race or color."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana modifies his amendment, in line 29, section 3, by inserting after the words "distinction of" the words "race or." It will be so modified.

Mr. BUTLER. Why not insert "nativity" after "color," I suggest to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator from South Carolina know of any such distinction contained anywhere? I have no objection to it, however.

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly I do. The State of Rhode Island makes some distinction of that kind.

Mr. HARRISON. In its school system?

Mr. BUTLER. Not in the school system, but in the matter of voting.

Mr. HARRISON. We are dealing here simply with the school system, and as I have never heard anywhere in the country of a distinction being made as to the nativity of a child in the school facilities afforded, I think I shall decline to accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Indiana has expired.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senate indulge me simply to suggest two other verbal corrections in the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has a right to speak to any new amendment he proposes under the understanding.

Mr. HARRISON. In order, then, that this descriptive word "common" may be carried through the amendment, I propose that in section 3, line 20, at the beginning of the line, before the word "school," the word "common" shall be inserted, and also in the same line after the word "the" and before "school."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana modifies his amendment in section 3 of the reprint by inserting after the word "the," at the end of line 19, the word "common," and after the word "the," in the 20th line, the word "common;" so as to make the word "school" wherever it occurs there read "common school." The amendment is modified accordingly.

Mr. HARRISON. Then in line 27, section 3, instead of the words "that have not provided" I propose to insert "shall not have provided."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And in line 27, section 3 of the reprint, the Senator from Indiana modifies his amendment so as to make that line read:

No money shall be paid out under this act to any State or Territory that shall not have provided, &c.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, there is not a more ardent supporter in the Senate than myself of the general principles of this bill, but I can not consent to support an amendment which proposes to compel the governor of a sovereign State to report to the Secretary of the Interior. The clause as it stands suits me perfectly well, and I am opposed to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BUTLER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. BLAIR. If any one will examine the language of the original section and compare it with this language to which allusion has been made in the amendment, he will see that there is absolutely no difference whatever in the meaning of the original section and of the amendment. The amendment says that no State or Territory shall receive the benefits of this act until a report has been made. The other provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall receive a report which shall be made by the State officer. It is only a preliminary condition upon the performance of which the money may be received in either case. The State is under no necessity of performing this condition unless it sees fit. It is not any change whatever in the force or meaning of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg pardon of my friend from New Hampshire, because the original section says:

That the Secretary of the Interior, at the close of each fiscal year, shall ascertain the total amount of the school fund to which the States and Territories and the District of Columbia are entitled under the provisions of this act.

And the amendment as proposed requires that the governor shall report to the Secretary of the Interior. There are other means of ascertaining besides requiring the governor of the State to report to a Cabinet officer.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida has the floor.

Mr. HOAR. I merely wish——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from Kentucky will look at the thirteenth section of the bill he will find there an imperative mandate—

That the Secretary of the Interior shall receive from the governor of each State and Territory a report, to be made by or through such governor.

True, that is stricken out. That was an order that the report be made. Instead of that the language in this amendment only says that the money shall go if the governor makes the report. The bill as it stood ordered the governor. That is stricken out and softened by the present amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, it seems to me that there is a great deal more importance attached to these reports than is necessary. In the bill to which I drew the attention of the Senate a while ago a similar report was required to be made—the bill for the education of the blind. There is nothing in the present bill which says from what quarter the report shall come, and it may be from the chief of the educational bureau of the State. Section 4 of the act approved March 3, 1879, which appropriated $250,000 to aid in the education of the blind, has a similar provision. Let me read the whole act:

A bill to promote the education of the blind.

Whereas the trustees, superintendent, and teachers of the various State and public institutions for the instruction of the blind, representing the interests of over 30,000 blind persons in the United States, have united in a petition to Congress to take into consideration the needs of the blind in the United States; and

Whereas the Association of the American Instructors of the Blind, at their session in Philadelphia, in August, 1876, representing twenty-six State and public institutions for the instruction of the blind, have set forth in a series of resolutions that the especial needs of the blind are embossed books and tangible apparatus, and have recommended that if any aid should be given by Congress it would most efficiently come through increasing the means of the American Printing House for the blind, located in Louisville, Ky.; and

Whereas it appears that the Kentucky Legislature, in 1858, by an act of special legislation, declared James Guthrie, W. F. Bullock, Theodore S. Bell, Bryce M. Patten, John Milton, H. T. Curd, and A. O. Brannin, and their successors, a body corporate under the name and style of the Trustees of the American Printing House for the Blind, with the avowed purpose of printing books and making apparatus for the instruction of the blind of the United States for general distribution, and for the sake of philanthropy, and with no desire for pecuniary gain; and

Whereas the States of Louisiana, Mississippi, Tennessee, Kentucky, New Jersey, and Delaware have made appropriations for the aid of said American Printing House for the Blind, for which, on account of the outbreak of the civil war, only a small part of the money appropriated by the first three named States was ever available; and

Whereas by the money from the States of Kentucky, New Jersey, and Delaware, a printing-house for the blind was established, and is now supplied with presses, type, stereotype foundery, steam-engine, a well-equipped bindery, and all the appliances necessary for the manufacture of embossed books, and has for the last ten years been manufacturing embossed books superior in every way to any manufactured elsewhere, which have been distributed gratuitously to the blind in the States of Kentucky, New Jersey, and Delaware, by which the blind in those States have been very much benefited; and

Whereas it is desirable that the blind of the whole country should be equally benefited, and the intentions of the trustees to establish an educational institution of the most practical beneficence and wisest philanthropy upon a national basis, should be accomplished, inasmuch as the education of the blind is a subject of national importance: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of $250,000, out of money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, be, and hereby is, set apart as a perpetual fund for the purpose of aiding the education of the blind in the United States of America, through the American Printing House for the Blind.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States is hereby directed to hold said sum in trust for the purpose aforesaid; and it shall be his duty, upon the passage of this act, to invest said sum in United States interest-bearing bonds, bearing interest at 4 per cent., of the issue of July, 1870, and upon their maturity to reinvest their proceeds in other United States interest-bearing bonds, and so on forever.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States is hereby authorized to pay over, semi-annually, to the trustees of the American Printing House for the Blind, located in Louisville, Ky., and chartered in 1858 by the Legislature of Kentucky, upon the requisition of their president, countersigned by their treasurer, the semi-annual interest upon the said bonds, upon the following conditions:

First. The income upon the bonds thus held in trust for the education of the blind shall be expended by the trustees of the American Printing House each year in manufacturing and furnishing embossed books for the blind and tangible apparatus for their instruction; and the total amount of such books and apparatus so manufactured and furnished by this income shall each year be distributed among all the public institutions for the education of the blind in the States and Territories of the United States and the District of Columbia, upon the requisition of the superintendent of each, duly certified by its board of trustees. The basis of such distribution shall be the total number of pupils in all the public institutions for the education of the blind, to be authenticated in such manner and as often as the trustees of the said American Printing House shall require; and each institution shall receive, in books and apparatus, that portion of the total income of said bonds held by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States in trust for the education of the blind as is shown by the ratio between the number of pupils in that institution for the education of the blind and the total number of pupils in all the public institutions for the education of the blind, which ratio shall be computed upon the first Monday in January of each year.

Second. No part of the income from said bonds shall be expended in the erection or leasing of buildings.

Third. No profit shall be put on any books or tangible apparatus for the instruction of the blind, manufactured or furnished by the trustees of said American Printing House for the Blind, located in Louisville, Ky.; and the price put upon each article so manufactured or furnished shall only be its actual cost.

Fourth. The Secretary of the Treasury of the United States shall have the authority to withhold the income arising from said bonds thus set apart for the education of the blind of the United States whenever he shall receive satisfactory proof that the trustees of said American Printing House for the Blind, located in Louisville, Ky., are not using the income from these bonds for the benefit of the blind in the public institutions for the education of the blind in the United States.

Fifth. Before any money be paid to the treasurer of the American Printing House for the Blind by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States the treasurer of the American Printing House for the Blind shall execute a bond, with two approved sureties, to the amount of $20,000, conditioned that the interest so received shall be expended according to this law and all amendments thereto, which shall be held by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, and shall be renewed every two years.

Sixth. The superintendents of the various public institutions for the education of the blind in the United States shall each, ex officio, be a member of the board of trustees of the American Printing House for the Blind, located in the city of Louisville, Ky.

SEC. 4. That the trustees of said American Printing House for the Blind shall annually make to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States a report of the items of their expenditure of the income of said bonds during the year preceding their report, and shall annually furnish him with a voucher from each public institution for the education of the blind, showing that the amount of books and tangible apparatus due has been received.

SEC. 5. That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

Such provisions are simple matters of detail, not affecting in the least the principle of the bill. Here was an act which appropriated out of the money in the Treasury $250,000 to aid in educating the blind, and I ask in all seriousness if there exists authority in the Constitution to make that appropriation whether there does not reside a power there to educate those that can see?

As I have said, I attach no consequence to the individual votes of Senators, but I am invoking the action of the body to sustain itself, and I find that these bills have all these little details about them. But the great principle, after all, that lies behind is whether we have authority to appropriate this money. If we have we have authority to couple little conditions like those in the Kentucky bill.

Now, sir, where are you going to draw the line on this question? In the great case of Gibbons vs. Ogden Chief-Justice Marshall said that there was no authority in this Government to touch the health laws of the States, and after going over every power and authority that resided in the General Government on the subject of commerce he came down and said that there was no power in the General Government to make any law with respect to the public health in the respective States. Still we have departed from that, and I think I can say without exaggeration that if there ever was a judicial officer who carried the powers and functions of this Government to the fullest possible extent it was Chief-Justice Marshall; but he excepted out of the general power of this Government the power to touch the regulation of the public health in the States. But we have provided for that. We have established quarantine boards; we have quarantine officers in my own town receiving pay from the General Government and supervising the public health of the State.

I voted against the proposition referred to awhile ago by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] to establish a national association of education because I discovered or thought I discovered in that proposition far more danger to the institutions of the State than in this. I felt at the time that it was not a wise thing to do to establish such a national authority; but when it is proposed to give a sum of money to the States to be applied I say almost unconditionally—because there are no conditions in this bill that materially interfere with the independent exercise of the authority of the States over this domestic institution—I have to vote for it according to the precedents that have been established for my guidance by the votes of this body hitherto.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I want to offer an amendment, if I am in order, to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, which I trust he will accept, and which would, I think, make his amendment much less objectionable and still accomplish the same object. In line 12 of section 3, on page 3 of the bill, I would insert, after the word "until," the words "the school commissioner shall, under the direction of the governor thereof, file with the Secretary," striking out "governor."

Mr. HOAR. Suppose there be no school commissioner?

Mr. BROWN. There is in every State.

Mr. BLAIR. Would it answer to strike out "Secretary of the Interior" and insert "President," so as to have the report filed with the President?

Mr. BROWN. The real objection made on this side, I understand, is to the requirement that the governor of the State shall make report. I only desire to amend the section so that the proper State officer, under the direction of the governor, shall make the report. That will remove much of the objection.

Mr. HARRISON. I really can not see how the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia would avoid any difficulty here. If the objection is made that we can not make a distribution of this fund contingent upon the fact that a certain officer of the State, the governor, shall make a certain report, I do not see how you can make it contingent upon the fact that the school commissioner of the State shall make it. He is equally an officer of the State with the governor.

Mr. BROWN. I simply ask that you do not require the governor to make the report, whatever may be your authority, but that the proper officer under his direction shall make it.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not understand——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana how the State could make report if it had no such officer?

Mr. HARRISON. I was going to make that suggestion; but I had used the word "governor" here because I knew it to be descriptive of an officer that nearly every State has. If I said "superintendent of public instruction" I should name an officer that is recognized under the laws of my State, but there might not be such an officer in Georgia.

Mr. BROWN. Then, if the Senator will permit me, I will say "the school commissioner, if there be one, or if there be none, the secretary of state." I believe there is a secretary of state in every State.

Mr. HARRISON. If I could see that this suggestion really relieved any difficulty, I would not hesitate to agree to it.

Mr. BROWN. I think it does relieve a great deal.

Mr. HARRISON. It seems to me that it does not. Undoubtedly the material for the report, perhaps the entire report which is to be submitted here, would be prepared by the school superintendent of the State, and it would simply need to be certified by the governor, under the provisions of the amendment which I proposed. It seems to me it practically means the same thing. If it is to be under the direction of the governor by the State superintendent, then, undoubtedly, the governor must in some way on the paper transmitted to the Secretary of the Interior certify it, and if he does I do not see why he could not, under the bill, pursue precisely the same course. And yet, if it be the duty of the Secretary of State, or the superintendent of public instruction, or whatever officer under the laws of the State may have charge of these statistics, he can most conveniently certify them, and the governor can use them and simply attach his own certificate under the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to have it understood as it stands. It is:

> The commissioner of education, if there be one, and if not, the secretary of state, under the direction of the governor.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator from Georgia will allow me, now, he says "commissioner of education." That is not the description of the officer in my State who is to do the duty, nor in Connecticut, as the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] says. Therefore, if we do not happen to have an officer known as a school commissioner in every State, the amendment of the Senator would transfer the duty to the secretary of state, where it ought not to be at all. There are numerous States that have no such officer as a commissioner of education.

Mr. BROWN. What is the title of your officer?

Mr. HARRISON. Superintendent of public instruction.

Mr. HOAR. In our State the function is exercised by a board—the board of education.

Mr. HARRISON. I think we have named an officer here that all the States have, and he can choose the appropriate machinery in his State for getting the information, and simply certify it.

Mr. BROWN. Then to get at that point, as there is an officer we all have, I would modify the amendment so as to say "secretary of state." Every State has a secretary of state.

Mr. HARRISON. But he is not the officer who has charge of school matters in the State, and it is illogical to ask him to report on what he has not charge of.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The statistics concerning the schools do not come through the secretary of state at all in my State.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a point of order. I ask whether the yeas and nays have not been ordered on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An amendment is open to amendment after the yeas and nays have been ordered. It can not be modified after the yeas and nays have been ordered, but it is open to amendment by any Senator.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia, it makes no difference how he puts it, it seems to me is utterly impracticable. We have no secretary of state in Virginia; we have no commissioner of education in Virginia, and three other Senators have stated the same thing on this floor in reference to their States. It just narrows itself down to this, that some gentlemen think a governor ought not to report to the Secretary of the Interior. That is all there is of it. At last it is a question of State rights. If there is any way of bridging over this little difficulty, something that will adjust itself to all the conditions, I am ready to vote for it. If the Senators do not want to have the governor of a State report to the Secretary of the Interior, then let him report to the President of the United States. The underlying principle of this whole bill is that of general education, and all this matter of reports is, if I may be pardoned the expression, mere quibble.

What I want is that this money shall go right down to Virginia for the benefit of the children of that State, and I care not who may be called upon to make the report nor to whom he may make it, so that there shall be an officer of that State on the one hand and an officer of this Government on the other, each being recognized, the one by the State and the other by the Federal Government.

I say again—and I want to call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to it—this will not meet the situation. Three Senators have answered that there is no such officer as a commissioner of education in their States. Two others have answered that there is no such officer as a secretary of state in their States. We all know that there is a governor in each State and the governor can make the report. If there be an objection of that sort that the governor ought not to report to the Secretary of the Interior, then I ask the Senator from Georgia to change that so as to require him to report to the President of the United States.

Mr. BROWN. I will offer the amendment in this shape: After the word "until," in line 12 of section 3, insert "the officer of the State in charge of public education shall, under the direction of."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] will be reported from the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 3, line 12, after the word "until," it is proposed to insert "the officer of the State in charge of public education shall, under the direction of;" so as to read:

> That no State or Territory shall receive any of the benefits of this act until the officer of the State in charge of public education shall, under the direction of the governor thereof, file with the Secretary of the Interior a statement, &c.

Mr. HOAR. In my State I do not think any officer can be said to be in charge of public education. We have a board of education composed of twelve persons, I think. They have a secretary, who is an active and efficient person and does work of that kind; but I am not aware that he has any duties which could be properly described by the provision of the amendment. It seems to me that if you wish to avoid apparent compulsion on the governor you might say "until the governor or some proper officer of the State under his direction makes the report."

Mr. ALLISON. It seems to me that this is rather a delicate controversy. What is desired is correct and accurate information respecting the schools of the State. Now, who is the chief officer of the State? It is the governor. He has a right to receive from the superintendent of schools or the secretary of state or any officer in the State such information as may be required here. What is he asked to do? Simply to certify that information to the Secretary of the Interior. What for? In order that a proper basis of distribution according to law may be made to the several States. Now, is it possible that we are going to stand upon technicalities with reference to a particular officer in a State? What difference does it make with reference to any principle whether this is certified by a common-school superintendent or by the highest and most responsible officer in the State?

It seems to me that this is a necessary and proper provision in order that the Secretary of the Interior may make out the proper data, so as to reach not only to Georgia but to every other State which receives this benefaction. Every State is interested that proper information shall be given from every other State in order that the proper apportionment may be made, and that is all there is in this provision.

Mr. BUTLER. I thought the census of 1880 was the basis upon which this bill was framed! What is the necessity for any additional information if that is the basis?

Mr. ALLISON. Is it possible that the Senator from South Carolina proposes that we shall expend $77,000,000 for the purposes of education and take no account of the money? Some officer somewhere must be responsible for this expenditure—I do not mean with reference to how the schools shall be carried on, but as to whether it is expended at all or not. Suppose the State of South Carolina should get a half-million of this money and no part of it should be used for common schools——

Mr. DAWES. Some gentleman.

Mr. ALLISON. Some gentleman! They are all gentlemen in South Carolina.

Mr. DAWES. Some individual.

Mr. ALLISON. Suppose some individual in South Carolina should get four or five hundred thousand dollars of this money, is it not worth while for somebody to know that that money has been expended for common schools, and who will know better than the chief magistrate of that great sovereign State? Certainly nobody.

Mr. BUTLER. Then what is the objection to the bill as originally drafted?

Mr. ALLISON. I am not discussing that bill; but I find an amendment which meets my approval.

Mr. BUTLER. The third section of the bill as reported by the committee provides:

That the Secretary of the Interior, at the close of each fiscal year, shall ascertain the total amount of the school fund to which the States and Territories and the District of Columbia are entitled under the provision of this act, and shall certify the same to the Secretary of the Treasury. That upon the receipt of such certificate the Secretary of the Treasury shall, on or before the 31st day of July of each year, apportion the said total sum so certified among the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia upon the basis of population and illiteracy specified in the second section of this act.

That is the bill as it was framed by the Committee on Education and Labor. It seems, however, the Republican caucus met and agreed on the amendment we are now discussing as a substitute for the solemn action of the Committee on Education and Labor. That seems to be about the only reason I can at present understand for pressing this particular amendment so earnestly, when the bill itself provided ample protection to the Government and everybody else.

Mr. HARRISON. The bill proposes to make the first distribution without any inquiry into what the several States had done for education. The amendment which I proposed early in this debate was that they should have no more than they had spent the preceding year. Therefore the necessity for some preliminary report, just such as the bill requires, as a preliminary to the distribution of the second year.

Mr. BUTLER. I called attention to the bill as originally drafted by the committee, but it seems the Republican caucus has modified that and brought in an amendment here which it insists upon substituting.

Mr. HOAR. The original draught had a provision in as to all the years but the first.

Mr. BUTLER. What is the use of the amendment then? Simply because the caucus demand it?

Mr. HOAR. No, no. It was desirable that we should understand how the money was going. The bill had a provision that the Secretary of the Interior should receive from the governor a report as to every year but the first, and if there were no expenditure there was no provision. This amendment simply provides that the report shall show.

Mr. BUTLER. I thought the bill was brought here on the basis of the census of 1880, that all the information necessary would be procured from that, and that information having been procured by the Secretary of the Interior, this money would be turned over to the superintendents of education in the respective States to be expended by them under State laws; but it seems there are to be some restrictions thrown around it for the purpose of getting possession of the schools of the country. That is about where I suppose it will end.

Mr. BLAIR. There is nothing under this, not a thing, excepting that it was thought there might be some difficulty in the way of calling Legislatures together and making arrangements with reference to the acceptance of this first payment; and so it was provided that upon the performance of an easier act by the governor of the State, the filing of this first report preceding any payment, this money might be made over to the State without any embarrassment or trouble in getting Legislatures together anywhere. That is all there is of this that is of any consequence, and it is a matter of ease and convenience to the States if there are any so situated that legislative action would be necessary. At least that objection was raised and discussed, and I am very willing to see the amendment adopted for that reason.

So far as this relation between the State officers and the United States officers is concerned, there is not the remotest difference between the amendment and the original bill. The explanation of the Senator from Massachusetts that there was compulsion in the original bill, that it absolutely required a report, is an incorrect explanation; that is, it is no explanation at all. Both the amendment and the bill require after the first year reports of the manner of the expenditure and the condition of the schools as a condition precedent to the second and subsequent payments, and if they do not choose to make the reports they do not get the amounts. They have their election, of course. There is no difference. There is nothing to be mystified about, and I do not think that anybody who is intelligently anxious for the success of the bill will sympathize at all with the difficulties that the Senator from South Carolina has in his mind.

Mr. RANSOM. I will presume to say that I do not think it possible that any member of the Senate can be more anxious for the passage of this bill than I am. In addition to that I see now on the desk of my colleague the laws of the last session of the Legislature of North Carolina instructing the Senators of that State to vote for a bill of this character. But I trust my friend from New Hampshire will bear with me when I tell him that I at least think this amendment is not only dangerous to the purposes for which the bill is proposed to be enacted—I will not call it a dangerous precedent, but I will call it a dangerous principle in this Government.

I have read this amendment in the last few minutes with all the attention I possibly could, and it leaves distinctly, without question, to the Secretary of the Interior the distribution of this fund to this extent: that is, he is to determine whether the certificates made by the governors of the States conform to this act.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will permit me——

Mr. RANSOM. With great pleasure.

Mr. BLAIR. In the first instance, as the bill provides, the whole matter is subject to revision by Congress if he decides incorrectly. Of course some executive officer must decide in the first instance and execute the law.

Mr. RANSOM. I comprehend that difficulty, and that difficulty, as it has been called, has led, as every Senator here well knows in his own experience in this body—take up any year and he will find it so—I will not say to abuse, because I am not in the habit of using that word, but to confusion and trouble in respect to the action of Cabinet officers upon questions of discretion of this character. I do not think that any small matter of convenience, that any consideration of a little time, should prevail upon the Senate to give to an officer of this Government like a Cabinet officer (and I speak of them all with great official respect, and many of them with personal respect) this great discretion of determining whether this money shall be issued under the law or not.

Now, the paramount power in this country is in the supreme judicial tribunal of the land. That tribunal settles finally, as the opinion of the country now is, all constitutional questions, whether they come from Congress or from the executive government. It is proposed to make a Cabinet officer in this instance the judge of whether this money shall be distributed or not. Do we not at once perceive the difficulty, the peril of having a State hanging here upon the decision of a Cabinet officer as to whether this school fund shall be issued the next year or not? The Cabinet officer says, "This money must not be distributed: the governor of the State of North Carolina has not complied, as I think"—a Cabinet officer thinks—"with this law. I hold up this money until the governor of North Carolina comes here and makes his certificate conform to the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I have listened with a great deal of interest and anxiety in common with all my friends to the discussion of this measure. I should have been perfectly willing to be converted to the belief that I ought to vote for it, but the drift of the discussion has settled me in the conviction that I am bound to vote against it. In the mean time I am willing to endeavor to improve the bill as far as possible. I have been waiting to see gentlemen in favor of this measure get into precisely the difficulties under which the Senator from North Carolina now labors. You can not command a governor or a State government or any State officer to give you the statistics necessary to base this bill upon. You have no right to issue such an order to them; they are in no respect subject to your jurisdiction. You can have all the census you wish of the State; the Constitution tells you to get it; you appoint your own officers and send them there to get it. Now, here is the trouble: the framers of the bill have tried to make a trade, they have tried to make a bargain, and impose a condition precedent upon the governor of a State, "If you will give us all these figures honestly every year we will give you the money, but if the Secretary of the Interior thinks you have not done it we will not give the money." Why did you not order the State government to give you all these figures? You could not do it. Why did you not order the governor of the State to give you these reports? You could not do it.

Mr. LOGAN. Allow me right there to make a suggestion?

Mr. HAWLEY. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to enter into the debate about this matter, but to call the Senator's attention to this point: This law is not a command on the governor to do an act, it only says to him, we want you to act as the medium of conveying the information to us that we may distribute the money for the benefit of the children of your State. That is all. He is merely to be the medium to convey the information, and if the State refuses to convey the information then there is no obligation imposed on the Government of the United States to distribute the money. That is all there is in it. There is no command.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is rather arguing the case in my time. The Senator is welcome to do it, but I would rather he should do it in the time of another.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not want to take the Senator's time.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator says very much what I have been saying myself. Knowing that you can not command the governor, you ought not to offer him a price for the statistics of his State. Without intending to do it, I think in a subsequent section of the bill its friends have fallen into error; they say in section 13:

That the governor of each State and Territory receiving the benefit of this act shall, on or before the 30th day of June of each year, file with the Secretary of the Interior a statement, certified by him, giving a detailed account of the payments or disbursement made of the school fund apportioned to his State or Territory and received by the State or Territorial treasurer or officer.

You begin by acknowledging a lack of control over the common-school question by not imposing a command or duty on any State officer. If you have a right to command the State officers to give these statistics, it implies a right to go further. I do not see why you should not then go into the whole regulation of schools. If you can not order the State authorities to give you these figures, then go on and get them through the constitutional method provided by annual censuses of the school population, &c., and when you have begun that you have got well started toward establishing a common-school system in each State by Federal authority, and then gentlemen may prophesy for themselves, but I prophesy that you will have come to the end of a healthy system of popular education in the country. Let the people who have carried on this work for ninety-five years carry it on a while longer. They are making magnificent progress in popular education.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I wish to ask the Senator from Connecticut a question.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have yielded the floor in general.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognized the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, the executive department of this Government cannot know any officer of the State legally, except the governor, and if Senators will take the pains to run through the many statutes they will find that it is a constant proceeding to call on the governor. The Secretary of the Interior certifies a list of swamp lands under the act of 1850 to the governor, and the governor certifies back that it is all right, and he demands a patent for the lands so certified, and he gets it. The Secretary of War certifies a list of muster-rolls under the act of 1873 to the governor, and the governor examines and certifies that there are so many companies and they are entitled to a distribution of arms under the act.

I could cite many cases of that sort. It is nothing new. You can not say "superintendent of education," because some States have no superintendent. We have in Arkansas, and he has to report annually under the law to the governor. Some States have a commissioner of education; some States have a board of education. So you would have to put in a long phrase, "the State authorities under the school laws of the State," or words to that effect; but you can not skip over the governor, because he is really the only State official this Government can know.

I corresponded a good deal with the Secretary of War for arms for Arkansas, which he did not give me, when I was governor. I corresponded frequently with the Secretary of the Interior about swamp lands, some of which he gave me and some of which he did not. I did not feel insulted, nor did my people. You can not deal with anybody else but the governor of the State, for you do not know legally any other person there, and the statutes are full of such instances.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas if as governor of that State he recognized the right of the General Government to issue a mandate to him?

Mr. GARLAND. There is no mandate, as I understand it, here.

Mr. BUTLER. No; but I should like to ask the Senator to answer my question, if he would have recognized the right of anybody in the Federal Government to issue a mandate to him as governor of the State of Arkansas?

Mr. GARLAND. I certainly would not.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I want to call the Senator's attention to a line of this bill on the eighth page, section 13:

That the governor of each State and Territory receiving the benefit of this act shall, on or before the 30th day of June of each year, file with the Secretary of the Interior a statement, certified by him.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator allow me now, that we may not run ahead, to say that I have an amendment to that very clause he is criticising which will conform it exactly to the provision we are now discussing when we reach it?

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I think there is no kind of objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana. I hope there will be no objection on the part of the friends of the bill to it. It is certainly the customary proceeding and it is the duty of the chief executive officer of each State to certify whatever may be proper to be certified as evidence to anybody else. I hope it will be agreed to.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, I am getting a little interested in this bill at this stage, because up to this time I have thought that all of us who were in favor of general education were going to vote for it. It is in pretty good condition now to pass except that there may be some sort of difficulty, as it seems, in the mind of the Senator from South Carolina that you can not issue a mandate against the governor of a State or you can not compel a governor to do this, that, or the other thing. I should like to say to the Senator from South Carolina that a writ of mandate does not lie against the governor of a State and does not lie against any other officer of a State. There has been no question more certainly settled than that.

Now what is the difference? Only this, that in dealing with the governor we are dealing with a constitutional officer whose tenure we know, who has some responsibility, who has a constituency behind him. The other officers named by the Senator from Georgia do not exist in some of the States, and in those in which they do exist they depend entirely on the action of the Legislature itself. The superintendent of public instruction and the whole board of education in Virginia can be removed at any session of the Legislature, and within the last sixty days I have seen the whole system of public education in that State overturned.

Why not deal with the constitutional officer? There can be but one reason, and that is that you hold that the governor of a State should not report to a Cabinet officer of the United States. If that be your reason, then let the governor of the State report to somebody whom you may regard as his superior—not have the report made by a commissioner of education, or a superintendent of public instruction, or any man whose tenure of office depends upon the vote of a majority of the General Assembly of a State, but some officer who has constitutionally some tenure that we know.

I am as jealous of what I understand to be State rights as any gentleman on this floor. I must recognize the fact that some of those things that I called State rights once have been licked out of me, and I do think that we can make an appropriation here for the purpose of public education, and it is not beneath the dignity of any governor of any State to make a report to any officer of this Government that gives the money for the purpose indicated in the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I only want to say for the benefit of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] that the objection which he makes would be absolutely fatal to any condition in this bill. It can not be avoided unless we make this distribution absolute and not to depend upon anything in the school systems of the several States, because if we retain in this bill the condition that the distribution shall not be made to a State which has not provided by law a general system of public schools without distinction of race or color—if that is in the bill, then the disbursing officer of the General Government, whoever he may be, the Secretary of the Treasury, must when he draws his warrant or as a preliminary to the drawing of it determine the question whether the particular State demanding the money is within the condition. Here we simply confide that necessary essential authority in determining that question, which would rest with the Secretary of the Treasury if it were not placed elsewhere, with the Secretary of the Interior, and require him to certify to the Secretary of the Treasury that the conditions do exist which entitle a particular State to its allotment of this money, and the objection the Senator makes can not be obviated without striking every condition out of this bill and providing for an absolute distribution to every State, or by inserting the names of the States which should be entitled to the distribution.

I have endeavored in framing this amendment to meet the views of those on the other side of this Chamber who have favored this bill, and I have proposed here no condition that in my judgment was not essential. I have introduced no new condition, but I simply require another report of precisely the same character as the condition of the first allotment which the bill that has met the approval of those who have spoken on the subject required as the condition of the second allotment.

Mr. HOAR. I wish simply to add that the amendment on this particular point under discussion will probably not strengthen the objection which has been made; that is, while the bill as originally agreed on was a mandate upon the State officer, the present bill does not undertake to exercise authority to issue a mandate to him, but merely says upon his doing so and so the State shall receive so and so. The Senator from Arkansas says it is conformable to other laws.

Mr. GROOME. Before the question is taken on this amendment I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Indiana. In the concluding portion of his amendment he uses this language:

No money shall be paid out under this act to any State or Territory that has not provided by law a system of free common schools for all of its children of school age, without distinction of color, either in the raising or distributing of school revenues or in the school facilities afforded.

I want to call his attention particularly to the words "distributing of school revenues." I will state to him that under the law of Maryland we levy a State tax of 10 cents upon the $100 upon all the assessable property in the State for school purposes, and it is estimated that that levy will give us somewhere from four to five hundred thousand dollars, and under an express provision of our appropriation bill $100,000 of the amount raised must go for the support of colored schools.

In addition to that, there is in the school law of our State an express provision that all local taxes raised for school purposes from the property of colored persons must be applied exclusively to the education of colored persons. Now, the question I want to ask the Senator is this: Whether Maryland, in her very effort to protect and educate the colored persons by providing, among other sources of revenue for their schools, that the entire sum so raised from local taxation on their property shall go to the schools for the education of that race, has not, if this amendment prevails, cut herself off from any opportunity to receive any portion of the money to be appropriated by this bill?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know that I quite understand the Senator from Maryland. Do I understand him that the gross school revenue raised in his State by the assessment or levy which he has referred to is $400,000?

Mr. GROOME. No, sir; it is estimated in the appropriation bill that the revenue raised by State taxation for school purposes will approximate $500,000.

Mr. HARRISON. Suppose it be $500,000. Then, do I understand the Senator that the first $100,000 is to be applied to the education of the colored children?

Mr. GROOME. The appropriation bill says that $500,000, or so much thereof as may be raised by this levy of 10 cents on the $100, shall be applied to school purposes, and then says that $100,000 of the sum raised shall be applied to the colored schools. So that if, as a matter of fact, but $100,000 of the taxes for school purposes were actually paid into the Treasury in any year, that whole amount would have to go to the support of the colored schools.

Mr. HARRISON. Then I understand $400,000 of the total amount raised goes to the white schools and $100,000 to colored schools; and the Senator asks me whether that would bring his State within the provisions of this bill. I should say not. I should say that it would be necessary for the State of Maryland, in order to entitle herself to the benefits of this bill, to make an equal distribution per capita between the white and colored children of the State.

Mr. GROOME. The Senator has misconceived my question. My question was as to whether the provision by which the amount of local school taxes raised from the property of colored persons should go exclusively to the support of schools for the education of colored persons would not deprive the State of Maryland of all benefit under this bill?

Mr. HARRISON. I think it would; but before we got to that, the fact that the distribution is not made equally, but that only $100,000 of the $500,000 raised is given to colored schools, without regard to the second provision, namely that the amount raised by taxation upon colored people shall be expended on their own schools—either one of these, in my judgment, would exclude the State of Maryland from the benefits of this act.

Mr. GROOME. I will say to the Senator from Indiana, by way of answer as to that part of his remarks as to the disproportion of the State appropriations for the schools of the two races, that it is approximately in the proportion that the two races bear to each other in our State. About seven-ninths of the population of the State are white persons.

Mr. HARRISON. Then all that would be necessary would be to put it upon that basis by legislation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Maryland has expired, under the understanding.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope the Senate will bear with me while I say that this provision was intended to prevent discrimination against the colored people.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana has been heard upon this amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. I asked consent——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from Indiana proceeding?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. BLAIR. Right on this point I wish to put in a fact. The number of whites 10 years of age and over in Maryland is 544,086.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire has been once heard on this amendment, the Chair finds on looking at his notes.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield?

Mr. BLAIR. I do not, until I add that the number of blacks is 151,000.

Mr. MORGAN. Does the Senator from New Hampshire mean to break the rule?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no rule. It is an understanding, which the Chair can not enforce.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator does not yield.

Mr. MORGAN. In addition to what the Senator from Maryland has said in respect to the law of his State on the subject of discrimination in the levy of taxes and the distribution of school money, I wish to read from the statutes of Alabama.

> Each township or other school district shall be entitled to receive for the support of public schools therein all the poll-tax raised in and for such district, and the county superintendent of education of each county shall see that the amount of poll-tax paid by white persons shall be applied exclusively to the maintenance of schools for white pupils, and all paid by colored persons exclusively for schools for colored pupils; and in his annual reports the county superintendent of education must show how much poll-tax he has received since the last report for each race in each district of his county.

In the county in which I live, where we have 40,000 colored and 10,000 white people, the poll-tax, if paid by the negroes, would be four times as great as that paid by the white people, and they get the exclusive benefit of it under this statute in their local or township schools. Now, because we have provided in our statutes that the negroes paying the poll-tax shall have the benefit of it for the education of their own children the method proposed by the Senator from Indiana would exclude the State of Alabama from any participation in any part of this fund; we have to go and change that statute before we can participate in this fund at all, and in changing it we should have to tax, if we chose to do so, the negroes in the county of Dallas, in Alabama, for the purpose of educating the white people there. That would be the result of it, and this Secretary of the Interior, or whoever it may be who has the right to pass upon the question whether we have made the preliminary compliance so as to entitle ourselves to a standing before the Treasury for this money, would exclude us from the donation of something like a million dollars the first year, before we should have a chance under our biennial system of legislation to even assemble our Legislature to get the benefit of this law.

The act as it is proposed to be amended and the act as it was considered in committee are both very crude. I will presently, upon another amendment, draw the attention of the Senate to a constitutional objection in the State of Alabama which prohibits us from receiving this money in the form in which it is offered to us now. We can only receive the principal and put it at interest under our constitution. We should have to change the constitution of the State of Alabama, in my opinion, before we could receive the benefits of this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. BUTLER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAWES. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 3, line 12, after the word "until," it is proposed to insert "the officer or person of the State in charge of public education shall under the direction."

Mr. BROWN. The word "shall" in the next line ought to be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will come in place after this amendment shall have been acted on.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES, of Florida (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

Mr. HARRISON. I thought the Senator was paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL].

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Only temporarily. I was paired with him on one vote.

Mr. HARRISON. I would say to the Senator from Florida that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] would vote "nay" on this amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Very well; then I announce my pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL].

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. WALKER].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. GARLAND. My colleague [Mr. WALKER] is paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER]. My colleague, if present, would vote "nay."

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. WALKER] being paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER], I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 32; as follows:

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GROOME. I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Indiana by striking out all after the word "color," in line 29 of section

3, down to the word "provided," in line 31, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "in the raising of school revenues."

The Senator from Indiana has already told me that these words "or distributing of school revenue" would cut out the State of Maryland under her law as it now stands from any share in this appropriation. I want also to call attention to the last words of the clause, in which, unless the system provides for equality of school facilities between the children of different races, no State can have any share of this appropriation. It is a matter of fact in Maryland, and I presume in other border Southern States, that there is a sparse colored population in the northern tier of counties. The result is in Maryland that the school districts for white and colored children are not identical in their boundaries. Colored children, from the very necessity of the case, sometimes have to go considerably farther to get to a district school than the white children. The law does not intend to make any invidious distinction against them, but it has to make the school districts territorially larger, in order that a sufficient number of children may be brought together to form the school.

Such being the case, any provision in this bill that requires that there shall be precise equality of school facilities in Maryland, and other States similarly situated, for white and colored children, as I understand it, deprives those States of all share in the distribution of this fund. Hence it is that I hope this amendment which I have offered will prevail.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will first have the amendment reported before the Senator from New Hampshire proceeds.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment to the amendment is in line 29, of section 3, after the word "color," to strike out "either in the raising or distribution of school revenue or in the school facilities afforded," and to insert in lieu thereof "in the raising of school revenue;" so as to read:

No money shall be paid out under this act to any State or Territory that has not provided by law a system of free common schools for all of its children of school age, without distinction of race or color in the raising of school revenue.

Mr. HOAR. The effect of that amendment would be that while it compelled the colored people to be equal to the whites in the raising of the revenue, it would not insure their having an equal share of it after it was raised.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, I think that if one will commence the sentence and read the whole together he will see that the leading idea is simply that there shall be a system of free schools established:

No money shall be paid out under this act to any State or Territory that has not provided by law a system of free common schools for all of its children of school age, without distinction of color.

There is no State that has not a system of free common schools without distinction of color. Then come the additional words, "either in the raising or distribution of school revenue or in the school facilities afforded." There is no State that has not a free school without distinction of color, which comes clearly and emphatically within this clause, and no State would be embarrassed in receiving the money by reason of these additional words. The objection of a difficulty which is suggested by the Senator from Maryland does not arise because these sparsely settled regions are inhabited by white children or black children. The distinction is not one of color. They might be all white children or all black children, or they might be half white and half black in these sparsely settled regions. It is not distinctly based on color at all. It is simply the circumstance that the regions to which this applies happen to be sparsely inhabited, and of course it is more difficult to provide schools for children scattered over perhaps half a dozen square miles than the same number of children scattered over a single square mile. That circumstance, however, does not depend upon the color of the children, and this phraseology has entire reference first to the establishment of a system of free schools, and second that whatever distinction or inequality there may be growing out of the absolute necessities of the case shall not be based upon color. This does not apply at all to what the Senator from Maryland says. I see no difficulty with the clause.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I think the more this bill is considered the more objectionable it becomes. The bill proposes to raise money by taxation out of the whole people of all the States for the purposes of common-school education. Then the details of the bill provide that unless any State in the Union shall conform to the requirements and conditions of this bill it shall not be entitled to any of the money appropriated by it. It may have made ample provision for the education of every child within the State, white and colored, but unless it conforms to the conditions required in this bill not a dollar of this money can be received under the provisions of the bill. Each State, therefore, is required to come and bow the knee to Baal, to obey the behests of Congress as provided for in this bill, or it shall not have one dollar of this money.

Then, again, the executive of the State is required to make report to a head of a Department here, actually seeking to do indirectly what you admit you can not do directly. You know you can not devolve any duty on a State officer, and yet you seek to provoke coercion for the performance of a duty you can not directly impose on him; otherwise the people of his State shall not be the recipients of any portion of this fund.

I do not know what will be the effect of this bill, but I will venture one assertion: There will be much dissatisfaction felt after it is passed in the very States now anxious through their Senators to obtain the money. For my part I am careless about it one way or the other. Being opposed to the bill, as I shall continue to oppose it by my vote, I do not care where the money goes; the small State which I represent will do her duty. If she does not, it is none of the business of Congress.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope the Senator from Maryland will himself see after the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts that his amendment as he proposed it would certainly not be right. It provides for an equality of taxation, but not for an equality in the enjoyment of the funds raised, as the Senator from Massachusetts has said. I do not think that the equality of school privileges which is provided for here would mean that every colored child should be in exactly the same geographical relation to a school-house with every white child. I do not think it would mean that; but it would certainly mean that there should be reasonable facility in the way of school-houses, reasonably accessible to the children who were assigned to a particular school district. It certainly would, it seems to me, exclude a State that made its colored school districts five miles square and put one colored school in the center of it, whereas it made its white school districts only one mile square. I think that sort of thing would be in violation of the law, and it may be that in order to bring the school systems of the several States upon that basis of equality between the races which is prescribed by this bill some State legislation may be necessary in some States. That is very likely; but I had supposed until we came to the discussion of this measure here, from the debate that had preceded, that there was only one State in the South, and that Kentucky, which had any unequal laws on this subject; but as we come to discuss this measure it seems to be developed that there are inequalities in other States. Now, if there are such and the State desires to get the benefit of this fund—and I am willing to put this question upon the broad, equal plane which is prescribed by this bill—it can very readily be done.

Mr. GROOME. Can I take the floor properly, Mr. President?

Mr. MORGAN. I would like to know what is meant by this? Does it mean pupils of equal grade and character, books of the same sort, school-houses equally convenient to the people whether black or white? "School facilities" has not heretofore been a term found in the statutes of the United States, and we can therefore resort to no judicial interpretation of the meaning. We have to guess at that.

Mr. BUTLER. I suggest to my friend from Alabama that under this provision the Secretary of the Interior is the exclusive judge.

Mr. MORGAN. I said we had to guess at it. I believe he does the guessing for us in this case; but this bill with the features we are putting into it now and as it came from this committee will be the subject of debate in respect of thirty-eight States and Territories of this Union for the next twenty-five years if we pass it.

Mr. LOGAN. Get up a new issue, then.

Mr. MORGAN. Of course some gentlemen who look to the doom of fate would like to have a new issue, but I am not going to look out for any, as I am not a candidate for the Presidency. The old issue will do me very well. But here we are providing for school facilities. The Senator from Maryland has informed us of a system in his State which is very admirable. Now here is a district which contains, I will say, fifty white pupils. It takes an area five miles from the center to include fifty white pupils; it would take an area of ten miles to include fifty negro pupils. It is a town or whatever you please to call it; in my State it would be a township. On that Maryland organizes two school districts for the convenience of the pupils in order to get the school-house as nearly as possible to the center. You say we may have separate schools for negroes and white people without violating this law. Therefore we must have two school-houses. They ought, each of them, to be as nearly as possible at the center of that township and equally accessible to all parts as provided in this act for two school districts, they covering the same identical area, in order that the children may have equal advantages of school facilities whether black or white.

Under this bill as proposed to be amended there would be an inequality of distribution between the whites and blacks, because the negro would occupy a district ten miles in circumference, while the whites would occupy a district five miles in circumference. Take the county of Dallas, in Alabama, where there are not more than ten white children to every one hundred black children. In that rich county the school districts would have just the inverse effect precisely of the school districts in Maryland in the part the Senator refers to. Here are one hundred negro pupils and ten white pupils. If you want to get a school of one hundred white pupils you would have to go nine times as far with your school district as you would to get in the negroes. That is "school facilities," and unless we can arrange in some way or other to put a school-house within the proper reach of the negroes in the communities or the white people in the communities, then the Secretary of the Interior is to decide that we are not entitled to the money. Here a sovereign State, as it yet happens to be called sometimes, is hung up upon the will and pleasure of the Secretary of the Interior to determine whether the school districts in Alabama furnish equal facilities throughout the length and breadth of that State for blacks and for whites. That is what the Congress of the United States, or at least the Senate, is engaged in trying to do.

Mr. BUTLER. And I will state further, in corroboration of what the Senator from Alabama says, that the Secretary of the Interior under this amendment is the exclusive judge of the school facilities furnished in the respective States. He is not only to be the judge of whether the facilities are equal as to the distribution of facilities, but he is to have the right to send down and inspect the school-houses and determine whether they are frame or log, 20 feet square or 100 feet by 150 feet, whether the blackboards are the same in each school-house, whether the school-books are the same, and whether the facilities are the same throughout. If in his judgment he should determine that they are not equal, he has the right under this amendment to prevent a State receiving the money. There can be no other construction put upon this amendment. It says that—

No money shall be paid out under this act to any State or Territory that has not provided by law a system of free common schools for all of its children of school age without distinction of color either in the raising or distributing of school revenue or in the school facilities afforded: Provided, That separate schools for white and colored children shall not be considered a violation of this condition.

Now what follows?

The Secretary of the Interior shall thereupon—certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the names of the States and Territories which he finds to be entitled to share in the benefits of this act, and also the amount due to each.

Throwing the entire judgment of the school facilities, the raising and distribution of the school revenues, upon the Secretary of the Interior, and any State or Territory may not get one dollar of this money if the Secretary of the Interior should determine that the governor had not complied with every single requisition of this amendment although the State had complied with all the requisitions I have stated. I submit that that is putting the common-school system of this country absolutely at the mercy of a Cabinet officer of this Government, and there is no other construction to be put upon it.

Mr. BLAIR. There is an appeal to Congress.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from New Hampshire says there can be an appeal to Congress. Suppose Congress should not be in session and would not be perhaps for months after the Secretary of the Interior had declined to certify that all those requisitions had been complied with?

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. Has he is his mind now an officer that he would desire to have make this statement?

Mr. BUTLER. No. I am very frank to say that I do not think any Federal officer ought to determine it.

Mr. LOGAN. Who should determine it?

Mr. BUTLER. My own opinion is, if we admit the constitutional right of Congress to make an appropriation and to make it according to illiteracy by the census of 1880, which I supposed until recently was the basis on which it was to be determined, the money should be paid over to the State to be disbursed by the State officers in aid of common schools.

Mr. LOGAN. Would not some officer then have to determine as to the mode and manner of distribution, as to school facilities, &c.?

Mr. BUTLER. Some Federal officer?

Mr. LOGAN. Some officer, State or Federal.

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. The objection you have to this provision is that it is a Federal officer and not because it is a particular individual.

Mr. BUTLER. No; it is not that.

Mr. LOGAN. Then what is the objection, because some person will have to determine that question? If the objection does not go to the point that it is a Federal officer, what is the objection?

Mr. BUTLER. I will indicate by reading to the Senator the conditions required by the act of 1862 making the distribution of agricultural land-scrip, which was the sole condition that if the money should be lost it should be replaced by the State, and no part of it should be used for building school-houses, &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from South Carolina according to the understanding has expired.

Mr. RANSOM. I do not know that I can speak for the Senator from South Carolina in reply to my friend from Illinois, but I can speak for myself.

As I understand this bill, before Senators would vote for it on the statements made on the floor of the Senate in the debate, and in view of the contemporaneous history we have in reference to the school question in the Southern States, I apprehend there can be but little doubt, I do not believe there can be any doubt that without any inducements of the benefits of this or any other bill, of their own accord, without using these expressions "equal facilities" and "discriminations," the Southern States have been eminently and extraordinarily just to the colored people in the matter of education. Without any bounty from the General Government to the Southern people every Southern State, as appears by history, by all the testimony on the subject, by the light pouring in from every source, has done rightly, justly, nobly, and grandly upon this question. Now the Senate is asked to say to these States, "before you can draw this money, although you have voluntarily given the highest moral evidence of your conscience and your duty upon this matter, before you can have a dollar of this money you must send your governor here, he must make a certain formal, specified, determined certificate to the Secretary of the Interior, and then that official must determine, in the language of the amendment, "whether you are entitled to this money or not."

My idea is, and I suggest it to the Senator from Indiana with the hope that he will embody it, that upon the certificate of the governor of the State the money should be issued at once to the State.

Mr. HARRISON. Certificate of what? Will the Senator state?

Mr. RANSOM. A certificate like that first provided in the original clause of the bill, that the State has a common school system and that her funds are distributed equally, justly, and fairly.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask who would make that certificate?

Mr. RANSOM. I do not object to the governor of the State making that certificate.

Mr. LOGAN. To whom should he make it?

Mr. RANSOM. He may make it to the Secretary of the Treasury, he may make it to the Secretary of the Interior; but I do not propose to have the certificate of the governor of a State passed upon by any officer of this Government. If it is ascertained hereafter that the certificate of the governor of the State is false, if any State in this Union—and I do not believe that there is a Senator who can lay his hand upon his heart and say that he believes such a thing will occur—if any State is recreant or false, then let Congress say she is recreant or false, and not any Secretary of the Interior, or any Secretary of the Treasury, or any Cabinet, or any executive officer say that a State has not done its duty in these premises, and that she can not have the money. Where shall we be, where will the Senator from Illinois be, where shall I be if our governor sends his certificate here and the Secretary of the Interior will not discount the bill? He says it is not right; we must come and beg for the money, or we must go back and have the certificate amended.

Mr. LOGAN. I will say to the Senator that the governor of my State would have no feeling in reference to having to make a certificate. I am only surprised that the feeling exists on one side of the Chamber. I have no doubt about the governor of the State of Illinois making his certificate and not complaining of being required to do it, either. It is not material to me whether he makes it to the Secretary of the Interior or any other Secretary; he will make it for the people of the State, and make it truthfully, and so any other governor ought to do.

Mr. RANSOM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. RANSOM. Then I move to change the word "and," in the amendment of the Senator from Maryland, and I can have a few minutes more.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his amendment.

Mr. RANSOM. I move to strike out the word "and."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that there is no word "and" in the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Is it not an amendment in the third degree?

Mr. RANSOM. Well, the word "the" or the word "facilities." I believe I learned that art in this body from the Senator from Vermont, if I am not mistaken about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from North Carolina will state where his amendment is to come in the Chair will have it reported.

Mr. RANSOM. I will move to strike out the word "facilities."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina moves to amend as will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of line 30, it is proposed to strike out the word "facilities."

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. HARRISON. I made the point of order that this was an amendment in the third degree, and at the same time I asked that there might be consent that the Senator from North Carolina should proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the amendment is in order. The amendment of the Senator from Maryland is to strike out and insert, and the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina is to perfect the paragraph proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well.

Mr. RANSOM. I ask pardon of the Senate for this little ruse of that practice which has been habitual in the Senate ever since I have been a member of the body.

I wish to say to my friend from Illinois that I am not discussing and I shall not discuss this question from a partisan or a sectional view. As I said before, I have the instructions of the Legislature of the State of North Carolina, the very Legislature that sent me here, to vote for this bill. I do not want to discuss the question what are the views of the governor of Illinois or the governor of North Carolina as to the rights of the States, but I want to treat this as applying to all the States, and if Senators will reflect upon it they will agree with me.

I do not wish a fund which is to be paid to each State in this Union (for I believe every State is to have a portion of this fund) to depend on the discretion of any executive officer of this Government. We can trust the governors of the States when they send their certificates here and say that these school laws are in compliance with the acts of Congress. That is going very far for us. That certificate should be taken as true; it at least should be prima facie evidence that the State is entitled to draw the money, and then if any State should not do its duty, if any State should be found recreant, Congress can take the matter in hand.

Mr. LAPHAM. Will the honorable Senator allow me to make one inquiry?

Mr. RANSOM. Yes, sir.

Mr. LAPHAM. Can we not trust the Secretary of the Interior as well as trust the governor to act properly?

Mr. RANSOM. The question warns me how rapidly we are tending in the wrong direction. The Senator asks me if we can not trust some human being, if we can not trust some officer. I tell him no; forever no. The theory of this Government is that you shall not trust men; you shall trust law. Has not every newspaper in the country been full for the last dozen years of mistakes, of errors committed by Cabinet officers in the administration of the Government?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. By governors also.

Mr. RANSOM. By governors, too, if you will. But here is the final supervision of Congress, and the simple question is after what has been stated on this floor to the world on this question of the action of the South, will you take the certificate of the governor of a State or do you prefer to let that governor send the certificate to the Secretary of the Interior and say you will trust no one else but your Secretary?

I ask the Senator from New York why he will not trust the governor of one of the sister States of this Union? What is there in any governor now, north or south, that you would not trust his statement? Do you not take his statement when you take your seat on this floor? How do you have a right to participate in the proceedings of this body unless under the act of 1866 you have the certificate of the governor of your State? And yet you can not take his certificate in a question of money.

Mr. LAPHAM. All that is done under an act of Congress, but I answer the honorable Senator by saying suppose the governor by inadvertence should omit to state one of the facts required by this Government, would you have the Secretary of the Interior pay the money? Suppose he should wholly omit to report one of the requisitions of this Government, would you have the Secretary, notwithstanding that, pay the money?

Mr. RANSOM. I did not hear the Senator from New York.

Mr. LAPHAM. I say, suppose the governor's report should wholly omit certifying on one of the requisitions of this Government by inadvertence, would you have the Secretary pay the money?

Mr. RANSOM. Mr. President, that comes right to the very marrow of the issue. I would not have the Secretary of the Interior, an officer of this Government by appointment of the President, refuse to a State——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, it seems to me the Senator from North Carolina has made his impassioned argument under an entire misapprehension of what the proposition is.

Mr. RANSOM. I hope I have.

Mr. HOAR. There is not anything in the pending amendment which implies distrust of the governor of a State. We propose, and the Senator agrees, I understand, every friend of this bill without exception on this floor agrees, that this money ought to be distributed to the States and distributed by the States upon a system which will secure equal school privileges to all children without distinction of race or color. There is no exception. Now, then, we have got to do one of two things. We have got to wait till Congress can take up and examine for itself the existing school system in every State, in which case this bill could not begin operation for a year or two, or we have got to trust somebody to find out what States are ready to undertake it on that principle now, and let it begin at once as quick as we can get our appropriation through this summer.

This bill says that the governor of the State shall state what the school system is. The governor is not to say whether they comply with this act of Congress or not; the governor is not to say whether these conditions exist in his State or not. They may or may not. He tells us what the conditions are, and there is not the slightest likelihood that anybody will question the integrity of these officials in doing it. Then the Secretary of the Interior, instead of waiting a year or two for Congress, takes those States where he finds that the conditions of this act exist and makes computation and apportionment, and reports to the Secretary of the Treasury, who pays the money. Somebody has got to make that apportionment. If the governor of any State does it, you have to submit to him all the reports of the governors of all other States to see what his State's proportion is. Therefore you have got to lodge in somebody the power.

The bill says the governor shall tell us what the fact is. The Secretary of the Interior on receiving those reports shall take the States which seem to come within this provision and shall give them the benefit. If he says the Maryland provision which has been described by the Senator from Maryland prevents that State from complying with the act, he states it truly just as the Senator stated it truly, the Secretary of the Interior says, "That is not one of the States to which I am entitled to pay the money over." Maryland will be in Congress the 1st of December next to say, "The Secretary has erred; we came within the provisions of the law when the Secretary thought we did not." That is all there is in it. How there is any indignity to the governor of any State, or how we can carry out the scheme of this bill without waiting two years before it starts in its operation unless some Federal officer is to make this apportionment, I can not see. It seems to me that all this impassioned argument is based on a misapprehension of what my friend from Indiana proposes.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President——

Mr. VOORHEES. Let the amendment be reported once more.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield for the reporting of the amendment? The amendment to the amendment is to strike out the word "facilities."

Mr. RANSOM. I withdraw that.

Mr. VOORHEES. I want to hear the amendment as offered by my colleague read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield for that?

Mr. CONGER. If it does not come out of my time. If it does, I do not yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would come out of the Senator's time.

Mr. VOORHEES. I withdraw the request, of course.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, I have not taken any part in this debate. There are certain provisions in this bill that are proposed and that are being considered by the Senate which I regard as essential to have in the bill to secure my support to its passage, if I can vote for it at all, and among them is that Congress may follow the disposition which is to be made of the money that it appropriates everywhere and for every purpose reasonably and fairly. That should be in this bill.

The objection to giving any discretion to a Cabinet officer seems to me the most surprising proposition, and especially from the Senator from North Carolina, of any objection that has been made here at all. Why, sir, for years and years appropriations to the extent of millions, and I think as great as $127,000,000, have been made where the expenditure of the money has been (although the specific sums have been mentioned for particular objects of expenditure) left to be expended or not at the discretion of the Secretary of War. My friend, with eager outstretched hands, has sought not to defeat the passage of that bill, not to refuse the appropriation of that money for his State, with the provision existing in the river and harbor bill continuously, never questioned, never doubted, leaving the exercise of that discretion to the Secretary of War. That has been the action of Congress year after year as to the expenditure of money appropriated in the river and harbor bill, and it has been left there after Congress itself had certified the exact amount to be appropriated upon each and all the improvements named in the bill in all the States. Who ever heard that there was any danger in leaving the expenditure of $8,000,000 or $10,000,000 or $12,000,000 or $18,000,000 a year to the discretion of the Secretary of War? The point never was raised here, but now in a measure of this kind which must have somebody to exercise some discretion——

Mr. RANSOM. May I interrupt the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANSOM. It is very true that in the first clause of the river and harbor bill the expression of which my friend speaks is always used, but he knows very well—for no person is better acquainted with the river and harbor bills than he is——

Mr. CONGER. The Senator talks fast; but my time goes on faster than the Senator talks.

Mr. RANSOM. The Senator from Michigan well knows that there never has been a proposition made in a river and harbor bill to reduce that bill 50 per cent., 25 per cent., or any amount, and leave the distribution of the money to the Secretary of War, that he and I and all of us did not vote it down.

Mr. CONGER. That is no answer. The Senator does not deny that every river and harbor bill says that the money herein appropriated shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. RANSOM. I will not interrupt my friend.

Mr. CONGER. The Senator knows that the payment of money has been suspended for months by the discretion of the Secretary of War; and some of it, although appropriated for a particular object by so august a body as the Congress of the United States, has not been expended at all because the Secretary of War did not direct it to be done.

Mr. BUTLER. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. CONGER. I can not yield. Can the gentleman himself not take his own five minutes?

Every warrant that goes to the Treasury, every dollar of the money that is paid out of it is paid out under that same direction and that same discretion. But when a million of dollars is to go into a Southern State my friends here flaunt before us and around themselves and around their States the great boon of State rights and constitutional privileges, and refuse to receive money granted, as they all claim it should be granted, for the benefit of their States.

I am glad of this discussion, and I am glad to have the people of the United States know that men oppose the distribution of any money out of the Treasury for the education of white or colored people at the South because the law intends in creating the fund to so word the statute that there shall be a fair and equal distribution of that money to the colored people. Let the people of the United States read the discussions of the last week. I have not sought to engage in those discussions. I was desirous that this bill should be so amended and so prepared that with some kind of regard for my own conscience and my own ideas of right I could vote for it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Michigan has expired.

Mr. MORGAN. I believe the Senator from North Carolina has withdrawn his amendment.

Mr. RANSOM. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina now withdraws his amendment. He had not the floor to withdraw it while the Senator from Michigan had the floor. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GROOME] to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. MORGAN. On page 4, section 3, I move an amendment to strike out—I believe, however, that would be in the third degree or how is that? I move in section 3, line 30, after the word "revenue," to strike out "or in the school facilities afforded."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama moves to perfect the paragraph proposed to be stricken out by the motion of the Senator from Maryland. That is in order.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 3, line 30, after the word "revenue," it is proposed to strike out "or in the school facilities afforded."

Mr. MORGAN. When this bill came from the committee it had a condition subsequent annexed to it; that was to say that the money might be stopped by Congress or by the Secretary of the Treasury in the event that after its appropriation, after it had gone into the hands of the States, it was not applied by the Legislatures or by the States in conformity with the provisions of the act. The Senator from Indiana proposes now to put a condition precedent in the bill, also retaining the former condition subsequent, on which a forfeiture of the right of money would occur. He now proposes a condition precedent, that is to say, that before any money shall be paid into the State treasury at all a certain report shall be made in compliance with certain requirements contained in this amendment. That report shall be made by the governor according to this provision, and it shall be made to the Secretary of the Interior; and if the Secretary of the Interior shall determine upon that report or otherwise that the State is not in condition according to her legislative situation to avail herself of the fund applied by this act, then she shall not have the money in her charge at all; but the State must then come to the Congress of the United States in the nature of an appeal to present the subject here before she can get the money.

That interposes the authority and the decision of the Secretary of the Interior antecedent to the payment of any money into the hands of the State at all, to determine whether the State is in condition to carry this act into effect, or whether under her existing state of law there may be some discrimination in her statutes in favor of the negroes or in favor of the white people. I have pointed out discriminations here in favor of the negroes in my State and the Senator from Maryland has done the same thing in his. The Senator from North Carolina has referred to such discriminations, and all in the line of the true statement or history of the case, that the Southern people have been earnest and determined in trying to convince the people of the Northern States, with whom they have had trouble on the subject of the negro, that their intention and disposition in the handling of their funds raised by taxation was to benefit the negroes in the way of education.

Now, I say that to add another condition to this bill, a condition precedent before the money can be put into the hands of the State's treasurer at all, is to cast a suspicion over every State of the South that may undertake to receive it, and is to bring that State before the Secretary of the Interior to receive his judgment upon her whole social condition in respect to schools and school enactments. That would be an unwelcome thing, I must say, to any of the States of the South or of the North either. I would not undertake to put such conditions upon the State of New York or upon any other State of this Union, that an officer of the Federal Government should inspect her condition as to legislation, and as to the distribution of the school funds, and as to the employment of teachers, the building of school-houses, the apportioning of school districts, and the furnishing of facilities for schools before she should be allowed to have the money under this bill, particularly under a bill where if she has received the money the Secretary of the Interior or of the Treasury may afterward report to the Congress of the United States, or may even according to this bill decide against the State in respect of her having a further right of distribution under this fund, and upon that the bill provides that the State shall have the right of appeal to Congress—a rather humiliating position I confess, but at the same time I suppose we must take it. It will not be taken of course by my vote, but I should like Senators on both sides of the Chamber to consider whether we are not loading down the States with very improper and very unnecessary conditions in respect of the execution of this bill.

Mr. GROOME. Mr. President, now that I can do so in order, I avail myself of the opportunity to answer the question of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] addressed to me some time since. The Senator appealed to me to know whether I did not myself see, in view of the suggestion made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], that, if my amendment prevailed, while the colored race would bear its share of taxation for school purposes in my State, it would not get its fair share of the educational facilities afforded in that State.

I answer him without the slightest hesitation that I do not see it, but, on the contrary, see that if my amendment prevails that race must get full justice under the residue of the Senator's amendment or my State can get no money. The amendment of the Senator from Indiana would still provide that no money should be paid out to any State until that State had "provided by law for a system of free common schools for all its children of school age without distinction of race or color." That would secure to colored children an equality of educational advantages with white children, so far as the difference in numbers of the two races in any locality would render that practicable.

If my amendment be adopted, before Maryland can get any part of this money it must appear that she has provided a public-school system which gives to the colored school children opportunities for education of the same character as are given to the white children of that State. Nor was the Senator's remark kind that it appeared from what I had already said that Maryland had made invidious distinctions in this matter of education against the children of the colored race.

I have always been in favor of educating to the fullest extent of common-school education the children of the colored race. My colleague and myself in the Maryland Legislature had both the pleasure of voting for the original act in 1872 which set aside the annual sum of $100,000 of the State school-tax to be applied, as I have already said, for the benefit of that race, and which the white race can not touch. In addition to the State tax, nearly three-quarters of a million of dollars are also annually raised by local taxation for school purposes and equitably apportioned between the races. But it so happens that the population of our State in certain localities is very unequally distributed so far as the two races are concerned. Take my own county of Cecil as an illustration. There are in the county as a whole about five whites to one colored person, and the disproportion in the upper part of the county between the two races is very much greater. In that part of the county there are probably ten whites to one colored person. Now, from the very necessity of the case the school districts have to be territorially larger in that part of the county for the colored people than for the whites, or the result would be either that the white schools would be excessively overcrowded or that the colored schools would have no such attendance as would provide employment for a teacher. Our law provides that the character of education in the common schools for both races shall be precisely the same.

But when you come to the matter of school facilities, we either have got to compel the colored children, because of sparseness of the colored population in that part of the State, to go a considerably greater average distance to reach a common school than the white children have to go, or we have got to educate the two races in mixed schools. There is no other alternative. We can not give the colored children precise equality of facilities with the white race except by putting both in the same school, and that is what the people of Maryland will never willingly do.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GROOME. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIR. Does the school system of Maryland by law, which is the language of this amendment, provide that because the children in a sparsely settled portion of the country happen to be colored, therefore they shall have less school facilities on that account, or does it provide that the children of any color in sparsely settled districts shall have less privileges than they shall have in districts more populous?

Mr. GROOME. It does not.

Mr. BLAIR. Then this criticism upon the language of the bill does not apply, if the Senator will read it carefully.

Mr. GROOME. I have read it carefully, and I think I understand its meaning.

Mr. BLAIR. It only relates to distinctions made by law, and nothing else. The distinctions of fact are not provided for in it.

Mr. GROOME. What is the distinction——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Maryland has expired.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire, if I can, to bring this debate back to where it started. The Senators on the other side of the Chamber who gave their confidence and their argument in support of the bill did it with a provision plainly written in the face of it that the payment of the second allotment to any State should be conditioned upon a compliance and a certification of that fact by the governors of the respective States, a certification, too, precisely or almost identically in the same language that is used in the section which is now under discussion. The question simply is, are we insulting or offending the Southern States when we say this shall be preliminary to the first distribution? Gentlemen did not resist a provision that this should be done as a condition preliminary to the second allotment. Then where does the offense or the insult or the injury come in if in order to get the basis of distribution the first year, in order to know how much they have expended and how they have expended it, we require as a preliminary to the first payment a report like the one that is required before the second payment?

Mr. RANSOM. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HARRISON. I can hardly yield any time of my five minutes. The Senator can have his own time by moving to amend similar to the amendment he moved a few moments ago.

Mr. RANSOM. I simply wanted to ask one question.

Mr. HARRISON. We are simply insisting upon a distribution of this fund which goes out of the general Treasury between the races without any distinction. The only reason we are voting any money out of the Treasury for education is because of the illiteracy which prevails among the black people in the South and because we have accepted the statement which has been made by Senators here that their States were unable to take up and carry the burden of their education. Is it unreasonable, then, when the object of our benefaction is primarily to secure education to the colored people, that we should ask the States that receive an allotment under the bill that they shall make an equal distribution of their own revenue as well as that which they receive from the General Government between the races without any distinction?

For one I say unless this distribution can be made upon that basis, unless the black boy and girl in the South can share equally in the privileges of education, then I am opposed to the bill, because it will not reach the evil that we are endeavoring to eradicate. It may be that some of the States will need to modify some of their legislation, and if the right spirit prevails there (such a spirit as many of the Senators on the other side have manifested here and have said was expressing the sentiment of their people) they will promptly make such modifications in their State laws as will put their educational system upon this broad and equal plane between the races, and then all the difficulties that they have observed in the bill will vanish at once. We have simply insisted here that there should be equality and fairness in the distribution between the races, and if there are inequalities in State legislation let them be removed.

Mr. RANSOM. I simply desire to ask the Senator from Indiana one question. I submitted, I hope cheerfully, to an interruption from him. My question is this, if the Senator from Indiana will hear me: If his amendment is substantially the provision of the bill as it now is, why has he offered this amendment and why does he insist upon it?

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator from North Carolina desire an answer?

Mr. RANSOM. Yes; of course I do.

Mr. HARRISON. I must have been very inapt in what I have stated heretofore or the Senator would have caught the difference between my amendment and the bill. The bill provides for no preliminary report for the first year. It provides for a distribution without reference to the amount that the State may raise, giving two dollars for one. I proposed that the State shall only have dollar for dollar, and a preliminary report became necessary in order to know what their system was.

Mr. RANSOM. To illustrate a little the difference between myself and the Senator from Indiana, I have cheerfully again submitted to his interruption when he peremptorily refused me one.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not wish to discuss any question of courtesy. The Senator asked me a question.

Mr. RANSOM. I certainly would not reflect upon the courtesy of the Senator from Indiana. The Senator from Indiana, as I understand him, says that the purpose of his amendment is to have these certificates preliminary to the first distribution of this fund, and that the bill already provides for the other annual distributions. Now I ask the Senator from Indiana this candid question, and I know he will answer it candidly. Has he not proposed a different certificate from the one in the bill originally? I ask him if his amendment does not differ entirely from the bill, and if in his remarks just now he did not say that he intended that it should differ?

Mr. HARRISON. I think not in any substantial particular.

Mr. RANSOM. Then why not take the original bill?

Mr. HARRISON. Because the original bill has nothing in it as preliminary to the first payment.

Mr. RANSOM. Then let the original bill apply before any money is paid out at all. Let compliance with the original bill be precedent to the payment of the first installment, if I may call it so, and do away with the Senator's long amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I have just one word to say in regard to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana. I find some other difficulties about this amendment than the one suggested by the Senator from Indiana. I understand his proposition to be that his anxiety is to have such a report as will secure the impartial disbursement of this money. That I understand to be the object which he has in view by his amendment, and that that report shall come in preliminary to any distribution of the money by the Federal Government.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire by this report to ascertain what the States are entitled to under the distribution made by the provisions of the bill and the amount that should go to each State.

Mr. BUTLER. Precisely. Now I have got the Senator to a point where I think we can come to some understanding with each other. He says that he desires that the report shall be made in advance; that that certification shall be made by the governor of the State. To whom? To the Secretary of the Interior. And he desires that that certificate shall show a certain state of facts in the State from which the governor comes. That I understand to be the Senator's proposition.

Now, what I object to is that the Secretary of the Interior should be the sole and exclusive judge of the sufficiency of that certificate. The Senator from Michigan says that we trust the Secretary of War with the disbursement of money. Certainly, but he does that upon his own responsibility as a Cabinet officer. There is no proposition in the bill to disburse one dollar by the Secretary of the Interior. Not one cent does the Secretary of the Interior disburse. If the Secretary of the Interior were to disburse the money, it would present a very different state of things, because he would do that upon his responsibility as a Cabinet officer.

Mr. CONGER. The bill provides that he shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay——

Mr. BUTLER. I decline to yield to the Senator from Michigan.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina is entitled to the floor, and must not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Indiana says that the Secretary of the Interior shall be trusted in this bill. I say that possibly he might be a very honest man. It is no reflection upon a Cabinet officer, but let us suppose a case. Suppose there is a heated political controversy going on—and I care not whether that Cabinet officer is a Democrat or a Republican—and suppose that during the existence of that heated political controversy the governor of a State should certify to the Secretary of the Interior such a state of things, and the Secretary of the Interior should say to him, "Well, that, perhaps, is your opinion about it, but unless you agree to use your influence to carry your State in accordance with my political principles I shall pick some flaw in that certificate, and you can not have the money."

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] sneers. Mr. President, we have seen in this country a great many such instances as that I have just depicted. It is not at all impossible that a Cabinet officer might use his office to have the money disbursed as a corruption fund. It has been done before, and it will be done again if this bill passes. I care not whether he is a Democrat or whether he is a Republican, put a million dollars into a Cabinet officer's hands to send into my State, and it is not impossible, it is not even improbable in the light of the past, that he may say to the governor, "Carry your State for my political party and you shall have the money, but unless you do it you shall not have a dollar; I can pick such a flaw in your certificate as will prevent your having the money until after the election."

That is what I object to in this amendment. It puts the States at the mercy of a Cabinet officer who is responsible to nobody but his chief. The governor of a State is elected by the sovereign people of the State and he is responsible to his constituency. I say if the alternative is presented to me whether I will trust a governor in preference to a Cabinet officer, I will trust a governor because of his responsibility to his constituency. He has his office, he has his official life by reason of the ballots and suffrages of the sovereign people, and the Cabinet officer has his office by virtue of a statute of Congress.

Mr. MILLER, of California. A Cabinet officer is liable to impeachment.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; and a great many people are liable to impeachment.

Mr. MORGAN. After the election.

Mr. BUTLER. After the election. I believe Mr. Jefferson said about the matter of impeachment that it was a mere bugbear or bugaboo, or something of that sort; that it did not amount to anything.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, we are having a few side lights, it seems to me, thrown on this matter, growing out of the discussion. Here is my friend from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM], who sat placid and gentle and quiet during all the time the main question was being settled, when we were agreeing to give this money, waiving all questions of State rights and everything of that sort, and there was not a word from this representative of the great State of North Carolina about any invasion of his State so long as we proposed only to give the money. But now when we propose to fix terms and the people who pay the money propose to fix the terms, it is an insult to his State and the governor of the State; and I suppose the tempestuousness of the Senator from North Carolina is a fit example of his people whom he represents here.

This is a national donation designed to be given to the State of North Carolina, and if they were to give their proper aliquot proportion they would not be here asking it. It is because they are to get money from somebody else outside of their own resources that this measure is proposed. It is because the people of Kansas are to give something from their revenue; it is because the people of New York are to give something from their revenue, and the people of Massachusetts and Connecticut, and the other Northern States, and it is because the people do give it in the shape of Federal taxation that it becomes a national expenditure which the nation has a right to evidence in any way it pleases, and the States which take it have no right to object to any kind of condition that may be attached to it. They need not take it if they do not want it; but to say that the nation which makes the appropriation can not follow the expenditure and shall not through agencies of its own determine how it shall be expended and sit in judgment upon the method of that expenditure after the expenditure has been made is an assertion of a States-right doctrine which I conceive the Senator from North Carolina has been lying in wait for. He was perfectly willing that we should give to these States this money by an absolute donation for them to do just exactly as they pleased about it.

Then comes the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] with a suggestion which I have no doubt has been in the mind of a good many people before, but it comes more freshly to me in view of what he said, that in some way there was some politics in the expenditure of this money. The Senator says in a sub-tone that he believes there is.

Mr. BUTLER. I will say it out. I believe that there is politics in this bill.

Mr. PLUMB. Now, let us see about this matter. The Senator says he is afraid some Secretary of the Interior will say to the governor of some State, "Unless you carry your State for my party I shall not pay you this money." I think that if a national officer is likely to say that, if that is a present danger to be guarded against, the danger that that governor when he gets the money will spend it to carry his State is a great deal more lively source of apprehension, or as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] suggests, that he will give an untrue certificate because he is obedient to a local condition of things or a local sentiment.

Mr. BUTLER. If my friend will pardon me, that is an additional argument against the passage of the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. I am not seeking for arguments against the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. You are making the argument stronger against its passage.

Mr. PLUMB. I am not seeking for arguments against the bill for the reason that I could not recite all the arguments that occur to me against the bill between now and to-morrow morning. I regard it as vicious in every line and letter; but if it is to be passed let it stand on the proper footing—a national donation or national expenditure to be controlled through national sources by national officials subject to the national authority, or else let there not be any appropriation made at all.

It has now become plain that the intention of the bill has been from the beginning (or at least the idea has been in the discussion) that this would finally be a donation substantially like that in 1836 out of the surplus revenues of the United States, to be divided up, to be used by the States just as they pleased. If we are to abdicate our functions as national legislators, as representatives here not only of the States but of the nation, we should put into as few and brief phrases as possible the donation to the States on the basis of illiteracy or whatever other basis you please, and then tell the States to take the money and bid them God-speed, do what they please with it. The Senator from North Carolina nods, and I have no doubt that is his view, and the view of the governor of North Carolina, and that a similar view is entertained by the people of that great State.

If the Secretary of the Interior is not the proper person to make the distribution, let us find some one. If we can not find a Secretary of the Interior who is to be trusted to do this business, how can we find a governor of a State whom we can trust? Here is a man who carries on the business of his office in this capital. He is responsible to us and is responsible to the people of the entire country, a responsibility which is much greater, begging the pardon of the Senator from North Carolina, than the responsibility of the governor of a State can possibly be. If the Secretary of the Interior is not a proper person to make the distribution, let the Secretary of the Treasury make it, or the President.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator will pardon me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Kansas has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. I will say to the Senator—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina has already spoken upon the pending question. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GROOME]. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. CALL. Let the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama moves to perfect the paragraph proposed to be stricken out, on the motion of the Senator from Maryland, in section 3, line 30, by striking out after the word "revenue" the words "or in the school facilities afforded."

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GROOME].

Mr. MORGAN. Let that be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 3, line 29, after the word "color," it is proposed to strike out the words "either in the raising or distributing of school revenue, or in the school facilities afforded" and to insert in lieu thereof "in the raising of school revenues;" so as to read:

No money shall be paid out under this act to any State or Territory that shall not have provided by law a system of free common schools for all of its children of school age without distinction of race or color in the raising of school revenues.

Mr. RANSOM. I move to amend that by inserting the word "common" before "school."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in order to move to amend the amendment. That is in the third degree.

Mr. BLAIR. That is in now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GROOME].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORGAN. In section 3, line 19, I move to strike out, after the words "school-houses," down to the word "derived," in line 23, in the following words:

Whether any discrimination is made in the raising or distributing of the school revenues or in the school facilities afforded between the white and colored children therein, and, so far as is practicable, the sources from which such revenues were derived.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. MORGAN. That portion of the amendment relates to the report which shall be made by the State authorities to the Secretary of the Interior. I propose to strike out that portion of it because it would only embarrass the action of the State government. The bill as it is proposed to be amended would take effect of course from the date of its passage, and we find that certain of the States have made discriminations, some in favor of the negroes, some against the negroes perhaps, but more generally in favor of the negroes, in the matter of school facilities and school education, in the distribution and raising of school funds; and if the Senate will strike out that portion of the certificate which the governor is required to make it will disembarrass this matter very much.

I suppose it is taken for granted that any suggestion I may make about this matter is in hostility to the bill. If the bill is to become a law, it is as much my interest as that of any person, I suppose, that it should be a good law, and a law that may have some operation.

When the bill passes it will date according to its terms from the day of its approval by the President. The States are excluded by the bill which under present systems, at the date of the bill, make discriminations of the character which are referred to here, although the intention in making the discrimination might have been for the benefit of the colored population; and we shall have a system of laws which no man can read without saying that at the date of the passage of the bill if there was any of this discrimination contained in the statutes of the State, then the State is not entitled to this money.

Suppose we take a more liberal or generous view of the question or of the text of this amendment than that. Then the State Legislatures must be assembled, and they must pass laws for the purpose of getting rid of any discriminations that may exist in their present statutes before they can avail themselves of this money.

The bill proposes that the money shall be expended within a year from its passage. That is the theory and purpose of the bill. With a bill operating in that way, no State that has any discrimination in the language of the donation of this money can possibly receive any money, at least until she has amended her statutes so as to root out and abolish any sort of discrimination in favor of blacks or in favor of whites.

I do not suppose the Senator from Indiana really intended it should have that effect, but I submit that that is the necessary effect of it, and this would be very much disembarrassed if he would strike out these words, so that the governor shall not be required to report:

Whether any discrimination is made in the raising or distributing of the school revenues or in the school facilities afforded between the white and colored children therein, and, so far as is practicable, the sources from which such revenues were derived.

I do not know why the Senator from Indiana wants to know the sources from which the revenues are derived. Must the governor go over the whole tax-list of his State and point out the different sources from which the revenue is derived before he can go to the Secretary of the Interior and have his certificate approved so that he can draw the money for his State under a bill of this kind?

The suggestion made by the Senator from South Carolina was both wise and opportune, for we do know that money moves the political atmosphere of this country more thoroughly and more profoundly than any other one element we have to contend with. Every Senator in this body knows that the great enemy of public liberty in this land to-day is money in the hands of political contrivers and machine-workers. In this coming Presidential campaign to which we are looking forward the ability of candidates on both sides is counted by the money they and their friends it is expected can handle. A governor of a State comes here with his certificate. The people desire him to have the money for distribution among themselves. The Secretary of the Interior says, "I will not give it to you until you make a showing here according to this bill of the situation of your laws that will enable you to receive it." The governor says, "Well, I will put into the certificate anything or I will take out of the certificate anything if you will let me have the money, because my people are pressing for it; if I do not get it I am crushed and ruined as a politician, as an individual; I am counted upon as a factious opponent of the law; I am at your mercy; do with me as you please." That is the attitude in which you place our governors.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not see what is to be accomplished by striking out the clause referred to by the Senator from Alabama. It does not change the condition upon which the money is to be paid. That is found later on in the section, and it would still be impossible for the Secretary of the Interior to pay out money to any State that made this discrimination. So striking it out of the report to be made by the chief executive of the State would not at all modify the conditions on which it was to be paid to the State.

Now, Mr. President, as to this talk which we have heard about the danger that the Secretary of the Interior may use his discretion, his official judgment which is called for by this bill, for base and political purposes, it is quite possible that governors and school superintendents may use this money when it comes to the States for such purposes. Those of us on this side of the Chamber, I would say to the Senator from Alabama, who are favoring this bill have not been unmindful of the fact that this very money that goes out of the United States Treasury into the treasury of the States may become a potent local factor in politics, but if we are to legislate on this question at all we must trust to each other somewhat.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Indiana will not, of course, speak in that way, for if it were so he would not have held a caucus upon it.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know to what the Senator refers by speaking of what were so; but I say to him that matter has been considered by every one of us who favor this bill that it was possible this money in the States might be used for local purposes The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] and other Senators on that side have more than once, since this debate has been on, given utterance to sentiments that if we had been prompt to resent this side of the Chamber might before this have made the discussion of this bill intended to appropriate money for educational purposes a partisan and a bitter discussion. We were told the other day by the Senator from Kentucky that he never trusted men twice. Mr. President, on this side of the Chamber we do trust men twice. If we did not it might be impossible for some of us to be on as friendly relations as we are with some of the Senators on the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. MORGAN. Or with your own party either.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know what the Senator means by that, nor do I intend now to bring in any discussion which shall be unpleasant. We have simply confided to an officer of the General Government here—and I may stop to remark that my friends on the other side seem to take it for granted that the Secretary of the Interior for an indefinite period of time is going to be a Republican—we simply provide what is absolutely essential, as I showed to the Senator from North Carolina awhile ago, if you put a single condition in this bill, that the man who pays out the money must pass upon the question whether that condition has been met. The only way to avoid the difficulty which Senators have is to wipe out the condition and simply say that if a governor says "my State conforms to the conditions of the law," then the money shall go without any statement from him as to what his law is or as to the amount that they have expended out of their own revenues the previous year.

Mr. President, I do insist that this provision is reasonable, that it contains nothing that is insulting, that it contains nothing that trenches upon the dignity or authority or independence of any State, but simply requires a statement of certain things which must be known before the money can be distributed, and confides in an officer of the General Government a discretion that must rest somewhere as to whether the conditions have been complied with.

Mr. RANSOM. Mr. President, after the reproach which I received from the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] for exercising what I considered to be a virtue, that of silence, in this body, my friends will not think I am intruding on the patience of the Senate. I have not had the time during this discussion, nor has it been my custom in the Senate, to speak much on any question. Perhaps I would have done better if I had followed the example of the Senator from Kansas. He shall not provoke or tempt me upon this bill to enter into a personal or partisan discussion. I regret—and I speak it with all the sincerity that it is possible for me to speak—that any allusion should be made here to party.

I tell the Senator from Indiana that I would have opposed this proposition just as strongly if the present Secretary of the Interior was a Democrat. I am resisting with all the ability I have (and I am sorry that the Senator from Kansas sees in it nothing but faction) what I believe to be a dangerous principle. It is not right, it is not in accordance with our Constitution; it is not in accordance with a free representative government that in the hands of one officer appointed by the President, not elected by the people, you should by one line in a bill or by forty lines in a bill commit at the same time the highest legislative, judicial, and executive power.

Why, Mr. President, what does a law amount to, what will this statute amount to after it is passed, if you make it hang upon the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior? Is that the function of Congress? If the Constitution of the United States and the people give us these great powers, are we here in the face of them to hand them over to a Secretary of the Interior? I speak with great respect of the present Secretary of the Interior. I am glad he is my personal and respected friend, although a Republican. But has not the history of this country demonstrated that it is dangerous to trust any Cabinet officer too far?

The Senator from Kansas alluded to the bill of 1836. Has he forgotten the notable discussion upon the removal of the deposits and the change of General Jackson's Secretaries of the Treasury? Does not the Senator from Kansas know that that act of removal of his shook this country to its center and raised a storm in the Republic almost equal to that of the late war?

Sir, we have no right to take these powers of ours that the people and the Constitution have given to us and hand them over to a Secretary of the Interior. The conscientious, the candid, the patriotic, the benevolent author of this bill on the floor of the Senate—and I say that from the bottom of my heart—has said "but the bill reserves to you an appeal to Congress."

Mr. HOAR. Do you not want the conditions complied with?

Mr. RANSOM. They have been complied with, and they will be complied with. He says appeal to Congress. What will that amount to? The Secretary of the Interior, in his arbitrary discretion, responsible to no State, responsible to no popular vote, actually vetoes the distribution to one State, or to thirty-eight States, and then you come before Congress to get Congress to do—what? Can you remove him? No. Can you impeach him? You can not unless he is corrupt; you can not unless you can prove almost a felony upon him. Then where is your remedy? What will you do? Will you turn around and amend your bill? Where will be the innocent illiterate children of the South or of the West whom you propose to educate? No, Senators, do not divest yourselves of this great, high power.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from North Carolina has expired. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. BAYARD. It is with a great deal of regret and pain that I have heard the question of distrust of the good faith not only of individuals but of parties discussed upon this floor; and I am sorry that the Senator from Indiana felt impelled to say what he did.

The motives of this amendment I will not impugn in the least; but it is open obviously to the difficulty that the very framework of our Government interposes between what I think is the benevolence extended and the object which is desired to be reached. The laws of the Union should be uniform; in many cases it is required that they should be uniform; and you are here attempting to adopt a system of laws that should be uniform to arrive at a system in the different States that no matter what may be their merits can not be uniform. The end and the means are not apportioned; they are not in harmony, and the consequence is that I do not think you can frame a bill unless you leave conditions entirely aside as was the original framework of this measure, which will be a practical and a working measure for the object designed. How can you state a uniform proposition which is not according with the letter, certainly with the spirit of our national legislation, for all the States? How can you apply it to thirty-eight different systems?

I have read the amendment which proposes to impress the condition of equal school facilities for white and colored children as the condition under which alone the appropriation is to be made to each State. I do not believe as a matter of fact that if that condition is strictly adhered to and enforced upon the bill 5 cents of these $100,000,000 will reach the real object for which the bill was designed, and that was to assist those whose illiteracy forms not only the greatest injury to themselves but the insecurity to the Commonwealth where they live and to the entire country. That is my criticism upon this amendment, and it is the trouble which comes from using the resources of a power that should always act on a uniform system and adapting it to another system individual in its nature and with the different features that thirty-eight different jurisdictions naturally would impress upon their independent systems.

I have stated before and I hope that my objections were comprehended and the spirit of them as to this assumption——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair to announce to the Senator from Delaware that his time has expired.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President—

> O wad some power the giftie gie us,
> To see oursels as others see us!

The Senator from Delaware expressed great pain and regret that any politics whatever should be brought into the discussion of this question, and yet I sat here at least fifteen minutes a few days ago and heard criticism, aspersion, practical insult, boiled down in words that blistered, against the Republican party for every measure of reconstruction from the first to the very last, from the Senator from Delaware, and the Senator from North Carolina repeated it, and the Senator from Kentucky added insult after insult to the Republican party for every measure of reconstruction. We have been taunted here day in and day out with having pillaged the South, with having plundered the South, with having treated her with every injustice, and almost every indecency; and yet, forsooth, if one single word is said on this side about the duty of the Government of the United States to follow an appropriation of a million of dollars into one of these States, then it is a matter of profound regret to the Senator from Delaware and to other Senators.

Mr. President, I have taken no part in this discussion. I have taken no part in it because I knew that my feelings were getting into that condition that I would not throw fire-brands into the discussion of a question of this kind; but how long, oh, Lord! how long, are we to be compelled to sit here and submit to these aspersions?

Mr. President, I will not now enter into this discussion except to enter my solemn protest, with all the solemnity of the Senator from Delaware, against any political question being brought into the discussion of this great humanitarian question.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana a question. I do not see anything so serious in this amendment of his. The amendment is only a recital of an act which is customarily performed by the governor of a State, and very properly performed, and the information which he is required to certify I do not regard as very important to the exercise of the power of the Secretary of the Interior. I wish to ask what necessity is it that there should be a report of the sources of revenue from which the State funds are raised?

Mr. HARRISON. I answer the Senator simply that we may see how much has been raised by taxation. The State is not to have more until we see what sources this comes from, whether it is a temporary donation of some one for a year, or whether it is a permanent fund with interest on it, or whether it is an assessment for the current year.

Mr. CALL. Well, I have no serious objection to it.

Now another point. The proviso is the important portion of the proposition, to which I see no particular objection. It provides that—

> No money shall be paid out under this act to any State or Territory that has not provided by law a system of free common schools for all of its children of school age, without distinction of color, either in the raising or distributing of school revenues.

Why shall not the distribution of money answer all the purposes? Of what consequence is it where the money is raised from?

Mr. HARRISON. I would say to the Senator that that was intended to meet the very case which has been suggested to be an existing case in some of the States, that the taxes were specially and distinctly levied upon colored people and upon white people; and the idea was that there should be a common and uniform assessment upon everybody, and then a common and uniform disbursement. That was all.

Mr. CALL. I suggest to the Senator that the word "distribution" would accomplish that, and at the same time the inequality in the raising of revenue in the State of Maryland is only to the advantage of the colored people, for it gives them all the money they raise from themselves, and then if you distribute equally the whole school fund they are only that much better off.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the Senator is mistaken as to the condition of things in Maryland. They get one-fifth of $500,000 and then what they pay themselves. That is not an equal distribution.

Mr. CALL. My suggestion is to leave in this bill the word "distribute," and then of course they will have to have an equal amount of the whole revenue distributed to them, and it does not matter where it is raised from.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MORGAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GEORGE (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN], who is temporarily absent. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. BECK (when Mr. HALE's name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] upon all amendments. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote on all.

Mr. HAMPTON (when his name was called). I voted on one amendment just now, as I was told the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] would vote in the same way. I do not see his colleague [Mr. ALDRICH] here, and I can not vote on this question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair), when his name was called. The present occupant of the chair would state that he is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT], who is temporarily absent.

Mr. JONES, of Florida (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. LAPHAM]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. GARLAND. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] is paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES]. If they were here, the Senator from Indiana would vote "nay" and the Senator from Missouri would vote "yea." My colleague [Mr. WALKER] is paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER]. My colleague would vote "nay" and the Senator from Oregon would vote "yea."

Mr. ALLISON. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

Mr. PLUMB. My colleague [Mr. INGALLS] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN].

Mr. GEORGE. I learn that there is a pair between the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS]. Therefore I vote "nay."

Mr. GROOME. I announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. GORMAN] with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH].

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I am informed that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] would vote in the negative on this amendment. So I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 8, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—8.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. HARRISON. It has been suggested to me with a view of perfecting the amendment that there should be put in line 24 of section 3, after the word "the" and before the word "schools," the word "common," so as to read, "to the use of the common schools." And then in the following line, after the word "colored," the word "common" should be inserted; so as to read:

> The number of white and the number of colored common schools.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana to define for us what a common school is. The schools in Alabama are called public schools, and they are graded; graded in four degrees. The higher schools in Alabama of the public system teach a very extensive academic course. I do not know whether they are common schools, or whether they are public schools, or whether they are academies.

Mr. HARRISON. I would say to the Senator that this term is one of universal use, at least so far as my observation goes, and applies to such schools of the lower order, not including universities and colleges, as are maintained by the State out of its revenues for the free use of its children—a common-school system.

Mr. MORGAN. I would say to the Senator that in the Southern States I think chiefly they are called public schools and not common schools. Almost all of them are graded schools and reach very far above anything indicated in this bill as being the general-welfare standard of education or the degree of the general-welfare standard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to agreeing to the verbal amendments proposed by the Senator from Indiana? The Chair hears none, and they will be inserted. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana as amended.

Mr. BAYARD. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed by the Secretary that the yeas and nays have already been ordered on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON (when his name was called). On this amendment I am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. BECK (when his name was called). On this amendment I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. I would vote "nay" if he were here and he would vote "yea."

Mr. JONES, of Florida (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). On this amendment I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. LAPHAM]. If he were here, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. GARLAND. My colleague [Mr. WALKER] is paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER]. I also announce the pair between the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES].

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I desire to announce that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN], who is opposed to this bill, is paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER], who is in favor of the bill. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL].

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. HARRIS]. The Chair would announce that the present occupant of the chair is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT], who, if here, would vote for this amendment, while the Chair would vote against it.

Mr. GORMAN. I announce my pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH].

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 15; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire now to submit the amendment which is in the hands of the Secretary, to strike out section 4 and insert——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all of section 4 and insert in lieu thereof:

That the amount so apportioned to each State and Territory shall be drawn from the Treasury by warrant of the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the monthly estimates and requisitions of the Secretary of the Interior as the same may be needed, and shall be paid over to such officer as shall be authorized by the laws of the respective States and Territories to receive the same.

Mr. RANSOM. Perhaps my apprehension about it is entirely unnecessary, but I would suggest to the Senator from Indiana that as I read this clause it means such officer as is authorized by the laws of the State to receive this money. That being the case, none of this money would be received by the States until a law of that character had been passed. Would it not be as well to say here "to the officer authorized by the laws of the respective States and Territories to receive the common-school funds of the State?"

Mr. HARRISON. I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that in considering the section as it stood it seemed to me that the matter was left in this situation: that this money would be paid over to an officer not authorized by law to receive it, who would not be held upon his official bond for it, and therefore that it was necessary to use the language which I have used in this amendment that it shall be paid to some officer authorized to receive it.

It may be that under some general statutes of the State the treasurer would be authorized to receive it; it may be that in some States he would not; but I would not meet that latter difficulty as the Senator from North Carolina would by turning it over to an officer who would not be held for it on his official bond, but I would wait until the State had provided by law who should receive it, because it would be a very loose method of distribution to turn this money over to officers who were not authorized by law to receive it and who were not held on their bonds for it.

Mr. RANSOM. I will interrupt the Senator so that I may have a chance to say a word. I do not know that the Senator could have given a better illustration of the confidence which he really has in the States in reference to this matter than to suggest that they would not have it turned over to officers without bond. I do not suppose they would. The Senator's amendment provides for no such thing, and I am glad that the Senator in that respect is disposed to trust the States. I think there can be no doubt that whatever officers are intrusted with educational funds in the States have to give bonds. I can not speak knowingly of all the States, but I know it is so in my State. I simply want that this fund shall be available at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. HARRISON. I want the same thing, but I want to avoid the anomaly of paying over such a large sum of money to men who have no authority by law to receive it. Therefore this language, I think all will agree, is essential.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I now make a motion, the reason for which I stated before, and which I thought was included in the amendment which I moved. I was misled by the printing of the bill. I move to strike out all of section 5 after the word "laws." That strikes out the latter part of that section about different races which has been already adopted in a little different phraseology in the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, and it is not necessary to repeat it. The first part of the language proposed to be stricken out, from line 6 to line 10, makes it imperative upon the States to instruct females in branches of technical or industrial education suitable to their sex and to give instructions in the industrial arts. The States are at liberty under the general bill, under a later section, to do that if they please, and this strikes out the obligation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will be read.

The SECRETARY. In section 5, after the word "laws," in line 6, it is proposed to strike out the residue of the section as follows:

And shall include, whenever practicable, instruction in the arts of industry, and the instruction of females in such branches of technical or industrial education as are suited to their sex, which instruction shall be free to all, without distinction of race, color, nativity, or condition in life: Provided, That nothing herein shall deprive children of different races, living in the same community but attending separate schools, from receiving the benefits of this act the same as though the attendance therein were without distinction of race.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope the Senate will not strike out the portion of the fifth section which is proposed to be stricken out by the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts. This bill is really intended to make provision for the education of the colored race. There is some varnish with respect to the education of poor white people, but the real purpose of it is to educate the negro race. Now, there is nothing that the young negroes of this country need to be taught so much as industrial and technical education of certain descriptions. They are not calculated to become scholars; their condition in life does not warrant it. They are compelled in order to sustain themselves, particularly in the cotton and sugar growing regions of the South, to labor a long time during each year in company with their parents for their common maintenance and support.

We can not afford in the South to pay negroes wages in raising cotton that the world will buy it from us to be compared with those of operatives in Northern factories and in Northern industries as they are called. The result is that any man, whether white or back, is compelled to work a very large portion of the year if he raises cotton and the grains and other food necessary to sustain him while he is at work. You may go through the State of Alabama—and that is about as good a State as there is in the South, about as prosperous as any—and you will find from this time of the year on to the end of the year white men with their wives and daughters and sons in the cotton-fields at work making the crops.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator if the schools in Alabama are stopped now?

Mr. MORGAN. No; the work is light, but it requires the larger portion of the year. The fact is it is a sort of motto among the farmers of the South that it takes thirteen months a year to make a crop of cotton and get it to market. So our people are occupied a great portion of the time in the labor necessary for their support, both black and white. We can not hope, under the present condition, that these people in the South will become learned and lettered people. They ought to have, of course, the elements of a good English education, as is suggested in this bill; but the most important thing that we can do at all for the young negro race in the South is to teach them those industries in the schools which are useful and honorable to themselves and their families, and a considerable portion of the time they are occupied in schools ought to be devoted really to that.

There is not in the whole South, so far as I know, a technical school. There is some technical education in the normal schools of the State, but very little. That man who is a real philanthropist, or a negrophobist, or whatever he may call himself, a friend of the negro family in this country, who desires to benefit that race, will educate them in the industries, to start them to work upon a basis which will after a while lead them to become operatives in manufactories, &c. As it is now, they are learning almost nothing of that kind, and I think we ought to make it compulsory upon the States having charge of the education of the negroes to use the money in this way, for if we do not start the system in this act it is not likely that it will take shape hereafter.

We ought to compel those who have the control of this fund to apply it to the industrial education of the boys and the girls in the South.

It is more particularly valuable, I believe, to the women than it is to the men, because they are confined necessarily to a larger degree of indoor labor, and there are many very useful arts which can be taught in the school or where the rudiments can be taught upon which they can go on and build an education which will compensate them more for the time they may spend in the school-house than anything else they could possibly acquire. I hope the Senate will not strike out the proposition.

Mr. HOAR. I ask consent to say one word, as I did not occupy my five minutes before. If what the Senator from Alabama says is true——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from Massachusetts proceeding again? ["None."]

Mr. HOAR. If what the Senator from Alabama says is true, that these arts are not now taught in any common school in the South, the bill without my amendment will require every Southern State to revolutionize at once its educational system. It will require them to discharge the teachers they have now and to get new teachers who are required to teach industrial arts where they are not taught. If the amendment prevails the Southern States will as fast as in their discretion they think best introduce these industrial branches.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to say to him that we have no such system of education in the South and the public attention has not been drawn to it. My point is to compel attention to it, to compel the starting of this system of education.

Mr. HOAR. They will not get anything until they change, if the amendment is not made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Now, Mr. President, my next amendment is to strike out section 7. That section relates to the District of Columbia, and the motion goes upon the idea that whatever educational interests we have in the District of Columbia we provide for in the appropriation bill for the District. As that is exclusively under the jurisdiction of Congress, we do not need to embrace it in the provisions of this bill, which relates to States and Territories.

Mr. MORGAN. I looked at that proposition of the Senator from Indiana with a good deal of attention, and I could not understand why he wanted to get out the District of Columbia from this bill. I took it for granted it was because the negroes here were not entitled to vote and therefore it was not worth the while of the Republican caucus to educate the negroes of this District.

Mr. HARRISON. I assure the Senator that was not the reason, but it was because we expect in the appropriation bill for the District of Columbia, which my friend from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] will presently report, to make liberal provision for schools here in the District.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana to strike out the seventh section of the bill, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 7. That the District of Columbia shall be entitled to the privileges of a Territory under the provisions of this act, but its existing laws and school authorities shall not be affected by the operation of this act. The school board of the District of Columbia shall be charged with the duty of superintending the distribution of its allotment, and shall make full report to the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Now, Mr. President, in section 8 I move to strike out all after the word "provided" and insert the following:

That no greater part of the money appropriated under this act shall be paid out to any State or Territory in any one year than the sum expended out of its own revenues in the preceding year for the maintenance of common schools, not including the sums expended in the erection of school buildings.

I ask to modify that amendment. It has been suggested to me by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] and others that perhaps the expression "out of its own revenues" might limit the sum used by the State to the general taxes of the State and might not include those local assessments for taxation which are authorized by law. I therefore ask to insert after the word "revenues" the words "or out of the money raised under its authority."

I think it is fair that where taxes are raised in a municipality or in a county and used for that purpose the money so raised should be counted in measuring the amount.

Mr. MORGAN. In Alabama—I can not speak for the other Southern States—we have sold public lands donated to us, the sixteenth section largely, and the proceeds of the sales are held in the treasury of the State, and have been since they were disposed of, and we pay 8 per cent. interest per annum on these proceeds, each township receiving interest upon the amount of money for which its section was sold. Is that a fund raised out of the revenues of the State?

Mr. HARRISON. I should think undoubtedly it was.

Mr. MORGAN. The bill does not so express it, and I do not think any lawyer would so construe it if he had a lawsuit depending upon it.

Mr. HARRISON. It does not say "raised by taxation" but "out of its own revenues," and that is undoubtedly a part of the revenue of the State.

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir; it is not a part of the revenue at all; it is part of the trust fund the State has to pay interest upon. The State has always paid the money and paid the interest upon it. It is held as a fund in the treasury now. It is held there on the faith and credit of the State, and the constitution provides that the interest shall be paid upon it. All that fund, as a matter of course, will go for nothing under this amendment. We should have to amend our tax laws so as to increase them by about $400,000 a year. We tax our people now $1,500,000 a year. Of that we expend $1,150,000, or about that, in governmental purposes, and the balance is applied to the school fund. About one-third of our taxes go to the school fund, of the actual taxation annually. If we are required to tax our people two millions of money, say so. We shall never get the people of Alabama to consent to a heavy tax amounting to two millions of money a year. We can not bear it.

Mr. PLUMB. It seems to me the Senator from Alabama is wrong in this matter. Whatever they do levy, as I understand the amendment, the United States authorities give them an equivalent amount. Whatever the State of Alabama does provide out of her own revenues under the authority of her own law, the National Government adds an equal amount. Consequently the State of Alabama is not required to increase its levy.

Mr. MORGAN. Here is a provision that requires so many millions of dollars a year to be paid out, a specific sum, so many millions a year to be paid out each year successively, and the quota of Alabama is based upon her illiterate population. She is entitled to that quota, but in order to get that quota she must increase her taxation in the State perhaps quite double what it is now. We are bearing all the burden of taxation there that we can bear really.

Mr. BLAIR. The State of Alabama will draw her full quota under the $15,000,000 clause even now, or at least over half of it, and with the $7,000,000 appropriated in the bill as amended she will get her full share upon the basis of illiteracy.

Mr. MORGAN. Of course she will get it, but she will have to double her State tax in order to get it.

Mr. BLAIR. Not at all. She will not have to increase her taxation at all. She is now raising an amount as large as she will receive under the provisions of the bill as amended—her proportion of $7,000,000, the whole amount the first year.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Alabama has expired. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to offer some amendments. They all go to the same point. The object is to require the States for the first four years not to raise more than one-third of the amount they shall receive from the Treasury and for the last four years that they shall raise an amount equal to the amount they receive from the Treasury. That was the way the committee originally reported the bill, and I think that is the fair way to do it.

Many of the States, as has been shown already in this debate, have taxed themselves to almost the full limit of the power of taxation. It does seem to me that in this act of donation and beneficence to the States there ought not to be imposed a condition which would operate so onerously to some of them as this condition will.

I therefore, for the purpose of carrying out that idea, move that after the word "that," in line 14 of section 8, the words "for the first four years" be inserted; that in line 16, after the word "than," the words "one-third" be inserted; and that there be added to the end of the section the following words:

And the last four years no greater sum shall be paid to any State or Territory in any one year than the sum expended out of its own revenues and money raised under its authority for the preceding year.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will first state the modification made by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] in line 17 of section 8, inserting after the word "revenues" the words "or out of moneys raised under its authority." That modification the Senator from Indiana has made. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] now moves first to amend in line 14, after the word "that," by inserting "for the first four years."

Mr. HARRISON. Of course the amendment as it is put now must be considered as a part of that which is to follow; it means nothing of itself, and the proposition of the Senator from Mississippi is that the United States Government shall pay three times as much as the State raises, for the first four years. I hope the Senate will not adopt that amendment. In the first place, under the appropriations as they are provided for now in the bill, I take it there would not be enough money, nor anything like enough money, to pay to the different States three times as much as they raise now. That provision was in the original bill, but the original bill appropriated $105,000,000, and now that this is reduced to $77,000,000 and the $15,000,000 to be appropriated the first year is reduced to $7,000,000 under the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi does not apply; it would be inharmonious with the bill.

I have not time now to examine the tables of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR], but I think he will bear me out in saying that the present appropriation would not at all suffice to pay three times as much to the States as they expend out of their own revenues.

Mr. BLAIR. No, it would not. I know there is no State that would be obliged to increase its present taxation in order to receive the full amount that it can receive under the bill as amended.

Mr. GEORGE. What was the statement made by the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BLAIR. I know of no State, unless it be Louisiana possibly, and I am sure there is no State that will be obliged to increase its present taxation in order to receive the full amount that it can draw under the bill as amended for the first year.

Mr. GEORGE. For the first four years?

Mr. BLAIR. The third year it would get a share of the $15,000,000; but there is no State, on the other hand, as far as I know, and there can not be more than one or two certainly, which are not every year increasing their own taxation for school purposes, their own school revenues, and I have no idea but what in three years from this time the State of Mississippi will be raising that amount of school money from her own revenues which will enable her to draw the full amount that she can get under the $15,000,000 clause which applies the third year.

I do not think that this is a practical matter of discussion myself as the bill has been amended. I think the amendment is well enough and does not interfere with the status of any State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE].

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi desire to move his second amendment?

Mr. GEORGE. No, sir; not now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to inquire of the Senator in charge of this bill what has become of the definition of common schools, or is it stricken out?

Mr. BLAIR. It is in an amendment already adopted.

Mr. MORGAN. I find that in section 4, on page 4, these words: "The term 'school district' as used in this section shall include cities, towns, parishes, or such other corporations as by law are clothed with the power of maintaining common schools," seem to be stricken out.

Mr. BLAIR. "All corporations clothed by law with the power of maintaining common schools" is in language taken from the section stricken out.

Mr. MORGAN. Is there no definition in the bill now of what a common school is?

Mr. BLAIR. As amended there is. The definition to be found in section 4, which is stricken out, is adopted at the close of section 11, on page 8:

The term "school district" shall include all cities, towns, parishes, and all corporations clothed by law with the power of maintaining common schools.

Mr. MORGAN. The same language?

Mr. BLAIR. It is the provision prepared by the Senator from Mississippi; the same thing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Now, Mr. President, in section 10, line 2, I move to strike out the words, "or the District of Columbia," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 10. That no part of the educational fund allotted to any State or Territory shall be used for the erection of school-houses or school-buildings of any description, nor for rent of the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Now, Mr. President, in section 12, line 3, I move to strike out the word "five" and insert "eight;" so as to read:

SEC. 12. That any State in which the number of persons ten years of age and upward who can not write is not over 8 per cent. of the whole population thereof shall have the right to receive its allotment and to apply the same for the promotion of common-school and industrial education, or the education of teachers therein, in such way as the Legislature of such State shall provide.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to amend that by substituting "twenty-five" for "eight."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. MORGAN. Some of the older States of this Union, enjoying advantages from the General Government in the way of tariff protection and otherwise, and enjoying a long run of commercial prosperity and freedom from the hardships and struggles of the wasting part of the war, have been enabled to furnish their people a school fund, so that they have reduced the illiteracy to 5 per cent. or below. I believe that is shown by the tables put into the Senate early in the discussion.

I object that it is wrong that the States which have had these advantages for so long a time and have not been compelled to endure the sufferings and hardships of other States should be permitted to have the entire control of this fund that we vote to them "in such way as the Legislatures of said States shall provide." It is an unjust and unfair discrimination, and it is an unconstitutional discrimination if there is any Constitution left at all, to pretend to make an appropriation of money for a general purpose and to give to any one State who may be concerned in the benefits of that appropriation advantages over the rest. There is no reason that can be stated in philosophy, none in respect of the spirit at least of the Constitution, why the State of Massachusetts should have the unlimited right to dispose of this money in the way that her Legislature shall provide, and that the State of Alabama should be restrained to dispose of it in such way as may be provided in this bill by an act of Congress. That is an unjust discrimination against the States, and there is no sound reason for it.

The Senators from Massachusetts can look on with perfect composure at any dealing that the Congress of the United States may hereafter take with respect to this fund so far as it concerns the State of Alabama, saying to themselves, as they lock themselves up in the security which is provided in this bill, "What care we whether we hold it or not? Our sympathies, our benevolence, our goodness, our Christian virtues may induce us to allow you to have this fund, to even vote it, but under what compulsion are we, what community of interest is there between Alabama and Massachusetts after you have enacted this law in respect to the payment of this fund into the hands of the State for the education of the people there?"

Mr. HOAR. You are not going to give us sufficient to make it a cherry worth distributing. That is the answer to all that.

Mr. MORGAN. Then the Senator from Massachusetts need not take his cherry. If it requires two bites to take it, let him not make any bite at it at all. I do not care whether the sum given to Massachusetts is a small one or a large one. She has had under this Government more support than any other part of this continent. She carries less abroad in the way of exports that other people purchase than any other State that I can recall now. She makes neither corn nor cotton nor wheat nor oats, nor does she make cattle or hogs for exportation. She furnishes but little to the external commerce of this world.

I observe that the Senator from Connecticut wants to raise it to 9 per cent. in order to get his State also within this boundary where nobody can interfere and nobody can touch it, and where they can look on quietly at the struggles that other men in other portions of the country have to make for the purpose of getting their allowance of their conduct and control of their own affairs. Let it not be pretended by the friends of this bill on the other side of the Chamber that they are doing justice according to the law and the Constitution by this bill.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama is entirely mistaken as to the scope of the amendment which I propose to offer. The amendment which I propose to offer is to strike out this section entirely, and then to provide that no State whose illiteracy is in excess of 9 per cent. shall receive any portion of this money for any purpose whatever.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I did misunderstand it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not see the necessity of this section at all except to make a difference between the States of this Union. Why shall this section be put here allowing the States that have not an illiteracy beyond 8 per cent. to use their portion in the establishment of normal and technical schools? Let them take it as we do, as part of their common-school fund, then if they choose to appropriate a certain portion of their own taxation to these technical and normal schools let the thing be uniform throughout the whole country, and not make this invidious distinction in the most important measure that has been before Congress during this session. It strikes me as making a distinction between the States where illiteracy is greater than 8 per cent. and States where it is less. It allows those where illiteracy is less to appropriate their portion to a totally different purpose, and requires those whose illiteracy is greater than 8 per cent. to appropriate the whole of theirs to common-school education. Let all the States have it for school purposes, and if they have more than they want let them take out from their own State tax a portion and appropriate it to technical and normal schools or whatever they choose in furtherance of the general purpose of education.

Mr. BLAIR. It seems a little difficult to get on with those who prevent the reception of anything because they already know enough, so that they do not want it, as is the case with some of the States, as has been urged here upon the floor as a reason for striking out the Northern States, when on the other hand the remaining States that would then be benefited object to being legislated into the records of the country, as they express it, as pauper States.

Now, there ought to be satisfaction under the bill in one form or another from the same class of objectors. After it is modified to suit them when they make one objection, they ought to be satisfied with it.

Having said thus much, I wish to state precisely the reason for this section. The bill provides that not exceeding 10 per cent. may be expended for the education of teachers. Teachers are indispensable to schools. The States most needing this money are without teachers as well as without school-houses, and without the necessary means of giving instruction. On the other hand, the wealthier States, the older States, so far as the common school as an institution is concerned, are getting but a very small amount under this distribution, a distribution which being based upon illiteracy carries something of course to every State in the country, because there is more or less illiteracy everywhere; but the Northern States are not receiving enough under this bill, so that if it is distributed broadcast to every child within their borders of school age, as is the requirement in this bill, that child will not get enough to pay for handling the money.

In my own State a child might get 20 or 25 cents. It is not worth while to make a State distribution, for we have no State distribution in New Hampshire, and many other States raise their money in small local communities. We have no State fund in New Hampshire of any consequence; and therefore in order to make the small sum that is coming to a State like New Hampshire (there will be perhaps $25,000) of any real advantage, being in the State treasury, it seems very proper that the State, while it has the right to distribute it just as any other State if it sees fit to the scholars per capita, nevertheless should possess the right under the bill to appropriate 10 per cent. of what it does receive to normal schools and the training of teachers, and it should also have the right to appropriate the whole to that purpose if it sees fit.

This section requires that whatever they do receive shall be applied to the same general purpose which the other States receiving a larger amount are required to apply their funds to, but in order that the fund may be of any use at all some provision of this description seems to be necessary.

Now, as to its being wanted in the Northern States, there is no doubt that in every State something is needed. Certainly I know many States where additional facilities in the education of the teachers is necessary. It is so in my own State, and this little sum of $25,000 would be a very substantial benefit in New Hampshire for that purpose, and so in many other States. And therefore I hope the Senate will be willing to let this section stand as it is. I am opposed to any amendment like that suggested by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. I think we should all stand on the same basis and receive in proportion to our actual needs; and if there is less need, that is, less illiteracy, in one State, she should receive less in proportion to her population, and that is no invidious distinction. That is the one we adopt; but the striking out of certain States is an invidious distinction, and for States that are receiving a larger amount to raise an objection here that seriously affects the little my State is to receive I think is hardly the thing to do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from New Hampshire has expired.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I am opposed to the proposition of the Senator from Connecticut, and at the same time I am in favor of striking out this section.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator from Illinois will allow me I will withdraw my amendment and give way to his motion. I withdraw my amendment, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Alabama is withdrawn. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana to strike out "five" and insert "eight" in section 12, line 3.

Mr. LOGAN. This bill goes upon the theory that those who are denominated and known as illiterates in this country shall receive an equal benefit from the donation from the National Government. The bill is understood to be one "to secure the benefits of common-school education to all the children of the school age * * * living in the United States." That is the language of the bill. If that be, so let the money be distributed according to that theory; and if the bill provides that the money shall be used for a common-school system and none other in one State, let the same rule and principle apply to other States. There are persons who are illiterate in all the States. If we aid them upon that ground we may as well aid them in one place as in another. Because the States are able to educate their own children, because they are willing to do it, is no reason why you should provide that they shall have no portion of this fund if they are willing to accept it, because it should apply to one child as well as another, whether it resides North, South, East, or West, if entitled to the benefit.

Another reason I oppose it is this: We have had a line drawn between the North and South long enough, and I will not support any character of legislation which is denominated general legislation in this Congress or any other that makes a distinction between the States of this Union. One of the great troubles we have had in this country has been the different theories of the different portions of the country. I mention it not in any spirit of feeling or animosity toward any section of the country. We should wipe out everything that would show a distinction of any character whatever where we can avoid it.

Now, why appropriate the money for normal schools in the North and for common schools in the South, I ask any one? Why do it? If a State in the North is capable and competent to support the common schools, it is competent to support the normal schools. Then upon the ground of their ability and capacity to support their own schools they can support one class of schools as well as the other class of schools.

Let us make no distinction in the bill in reference to States and Territories, but apply it alike to all persons who are entitled to receive the benefits of this donation, no matter where they may be. I do not believe that one dollar of this money should be used for normal schools or for institutions of any character save the common schools of our country. It is there that the poor children and the illiterates of this country are to obtain the education they will obtain. Those who are not capable and have not the means to educate themselves elsewhere, acquire the education that may be obtained in common schools, which is sufficient for them in almost any kind of business into which they may enter. Let the money be used for that purpose, for the benefit of that class, and not for the benefit of any other class.

It being the intention of the bill when first introduced and the intention as expressed by all the promoters of the bill at the time, let the principle exist and remain in it that we first started with, that it shall be for the benefit of the common-school system of the country wherever it is necessary, and for nothing else.

Mr. PLATT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois should recall the Senate from its wanderings to the consideration of the objects and purposes of the bill. The bill is introduced and supported upon one theory only, and that is that in sixteen States of the Union there is greater illiteracy by reason of the fact that the colored race is there. It has been stated from the commencement of this discussion to the present time that that was the reason why the General Government has been called upon to aid in this education.

I undertake to say if it were not for the fact that it is believed there is an obligation upon this Government to educate the colored children of this country, nobody would have introduced such a bill as this here, and no such bill would have been reported. Go to the country on the proposition that this bill is for any other purpose except for the education of the colored children of the country, and it would have no support whatever. There is no warrant for it in the Constitution; there is no warrant for it in the history of this Government. All its advocates put it upon that ground, and why not let us be honest and apply it for that purpose? If the bill were to educate children in the Northern States, there is not a Senator here who would vote for it. If the bill were to educate colored children in any State where the illiteracy was so great for that reason that the General Government ought to step in, all Senators would vote for it.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. PLATT. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to call the Senator's attention to one fact. Without naming the Territories, if he will examine the statistics he will find that two or three of the Territories are in as much need of aid and support for the benefit of a common-school system for the education of children there as exists in any of the Southern States.

Mr. PLATT. The Territories generally are making every exertion to provide funds for educational purposes, and some of the Territories have a larger fund in proportion to population for the education of their children than almost any of the States.

From the start of this discussion I have had great difficulty in voting for the bill. I sympathize with the object of it; I want to vote money to educate the ignorant colored children of this country, and that is the ground on which the bill is put. That is what the country understands we are trying to legislate here for; but I have great trouble about voting for a bill not one-third of the money appropriated by which will ever reach the colored children of this country. I do not believe the people of this country desire the Government to go into the education of children in the States where education is fairly provided, and where the States are able and willing to provide that education, and where the percentage of illiteracy is very small indeed.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think my friend from Connecticut states the theory of the bill or the evil which the bill is intended to remedy quite correctly. It is true that the occasion for entering upon this field of legislation was the fact that by reason of the enfranchisement of the colored race a large portion of the illiteracy of the country was added to its citizenship; and if that had not happened undoubtedly no bill of this character would have been introduced. But it is not true that anybody expected to confine the benefits of the bill to the colored children of the country. It is not true that the evil which it is intended to reach and remedy exists exclusively in the colored race. There is, as the statistics which have been read show, a large mass of white illiteracy, I think in one State amounting to 33 per cent. of its whites above the age of ten years who are unable to write.

It will be remembered that the statistics of illiteracy which are exhibited by the census-taker fall very far short of the actual truth. Every man who can barely write his name reports himself to the census-taker as a person able to write. It is said by one of the very highest authorities in educational statistics that there ought to be added at least 33 per cent. to the number of persons reported as illiterates in ascertaining the number of people who have no education, who are illiterate for all practical purposes of receiving or imparting knowledge by reading or writing.

It is not therefore true that we are looking out for the colored race alone. The colored people of course turn the scale and that makes this evil, which existed largely among the whites in some portions of the country, an evil of national proportion and demanding national correction.

The theory of this section, to which the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] objects, is simply this, that there are some States whose percentage of illiteracy is so small and the sum they are to receive is so small under the bill that it is not worth the cost of introducing in those States a new system of distribution and a new system of reporting for the money which they will get.

I will take my own State of Massachusetts. We shall get, if I have computed it correctly, about $100,000 only. We have about three hundred and forty towns, and among those towns are twenty-two large cities, and eight or ten more that will be cities within ten years probably, and forty or fifty more towns of five, six, eight, or ten thousand inhabitants. Our school moneys are raised by the townships. The State has a school fund very small in proportion to what the towns raise by taxation. The income of it is distributed on certain conditions and in a certain manner; not the manner provided by this bill, though equally to all the children of the State alike. Now, to compel us or to compel the State of New Hampshire—we having much less than the amount of illiteracy prescribed in the section, and having, as I said the other day, no illiteracy among our native children at all—it would be a great inconvenience and great cost for the little sum we are to get to make us go through this cumbrous and inconvenient mechanism.

That is the whole of it. It is not for the sake of making any distinction in the principle between the States. Those States are named. It only says that where the percentage is so small that it is not worth while to have it distributed, where the States are performing the duty themselves so thoroughly, you may let them take this one sum and distribute it by itself.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if it is not a discrimination against the States having a greater proportion of illiteracy?

Mr. HOAR. Those States give 10 per cent. of their own proportion to the same purpose.

Mr. BUTLER. Is not that a discrimination against the States? That is to say, this section will permit one State to regulate the fund according as its Legislature may require, but those States that have 8 per cent. of illiteracy must be governed by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. Those States where there is a clear and palpable need of it for common schools shall have it go to the common schools, or, in other words, where it is worth the cost of the machinery the common schools shall have it in that way; but there are some States where the amount is so small it is not worth while.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. HOAR. The normal school is a system of educating the teachers for the common schools——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. MORGAN. We have been having, as I understand, about 700,000 of population drawn from foreign countries for several years past, perhaps for ten years past or more than that. Assuming that one-fourth of those are within the educational age, a very large proportion of them certainly can not speak the English language and they can not read the ordinary school-books in the English language. One of the purposes of the bill is to have the children educated in the common schools up to the proper educational standard in that language. If I am correct in my figures, we have 875,000 people in the United States now who come from foreign countries, and must be within the school age, representing that to be from 5 to 21.

I think under such circumstances the States of the North need not flatter themselves that they have not got something yet to do. I spent about six weeks in Boston last year. It is a nice, beautiful city, with a splendid population, but I undertake to say that there is not a town in the United States that in the lower part of that city has a more rowdy, uneducated, boisterous, uncontrolled population than the city of Boston. That is due very largely to the illiteracy of the people. They are emigrants who have come in there; I must say they are very largely Irish people; but if there is a place in the world where a schoolmaster is needed it is right in the city of Boston. If you can compel them to go to school there and to submit to discipline you will do more for Massachusetts in that particular than you can do for almost any State that I know of; at least that part of it. The great body of the people of Massachusetts in the country are educated people; their children are cared for; but this foreign flood of immigration that comes into the city of New York, the city of Boston, the city of Philadelphia, the city of Baltimore, must increase the rate of illiteracy very greatly as it is described in this bill.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will permit me to say that the State is doing that work so faithfully now and so efficiently that while her population has increased enormously within the last decade and the proportion of her foreigners has increased enormously, the percentage of her illiteracy among her foreigners has largely diminished and is diminishing every year.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no doubt that it is.

Mr. HOAR. We have in school in Massachusetts more children than the census gives us children of school age within that State.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no doubt we have a great many more in Alabama in school than the census gives us of school age in that State. The census is not a reliable report upon any part of this subject in my judgment. How it happens of course it is not for me to explain, but in regard to any portion of the United States it is not reliable.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] referred to the illiteracy of the Territories. How does that happen? It happens because this flood of immigrants pours to the Northwest.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Not at all.

Mr. HARRISON. No; it is the Southwestern Territories, Arizona and New Mexico, that were referred to.

Mr. MORGAN. It will be found by an examination of the table submitted to us that the Territory of Utah has a less proportion of illiteracy to-day than several of the older States of the Union. Utah is not very celebrated for its good morals, but they have a very fine school system in Utah. I have been there; I have examined it. A very large proportion of the children of Utah are in school every day that they can spare from work upon the farms of their fathers, and as to Sunday-schools, there never was such a country for Sunday-schools as Salt Lake City and the surrounding region.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Alabama has expired.

Mr. HARRISON. I am a little surprised at the sensitiveness to what is supposed to be a discrimination against the Southern States in the section of the bill which we are now considering. The bill goes upon the idea that I suppose three-fourths of the total sum that is appropriated is to go to the South. It has been deliberately framed with that object in view. Instead of distributing this money upon the basis of population or the census of school children, it has been distributed upon the basis of an illiteracy that gives from two-thirds to three-fourths of it to the Southern States.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator pardon me just there?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I presume the Senator refers to what I said about the discrimination against the States. If it be true that so much of this money is to go to the South, why not let it go there on the same terms that it goes to Indiana, for instance, or any other State in the Union?

Mr. HARRISON. Simply because the condition of things in the South that makes it just for us to make this discrimination in its favor makes it improper that it should be used exclusively for high schools or the higher branches of education.

Mr. BUTLER. But what right has the Senator to assume that it will be used exclusively for high schools in the South? That is what I can not understand.

Mr. HARRISON. I have no right to assume it; I do not assume it; but I propose in the bill that we shall direct its use to the eradication of the evil the existence of which we recognize and for the removal of which the bill is framed. As the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has said, we have reserved to the Northern States so small an amount of this munificent appropriation that to distribute it all through our common-school districts in the State is simply an inconvenience; in many of the States we had better be without it. Therefore, some days ago I proposed to offer an amendment which should confine the entire appropriation to States having over 10 per cent. of illiteracy. I would have been glad if the bill could have been put upon that basis; but if the amount of the appropriation is to be $77,000,000, as has been agreed, then I am not willing that it should be put upon that basis, for it is too large a sum.

But are we giving any offense to our friends in the South when we say to them, "Though we would have been entitled upon any basis of population to much the larger part of the fund, yet we have given away all but about a quarter of it to you, and now we simply ask that in the use of that quarter in the Northern States we may not be compelled to distribute it among our school districts where it would simply disturb the machinery of our schools, but that our Legislatures may be allowed to use it in the normal school or in the agricultural college or in some method that will make it really a benefit to us?" It must be expended for schools. Even where there is a higher rate of illiteracy we allow 10 per cent. to be used for the education of teachers. I think there can be no wiser use of a limited amount of this fund than to prepare in the different States people who will be competent to take charge of schools.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I understand, if the Senator will pardon me, that there is not the same degree of accountability in those States which have less than 8 per cent. of illiteracy that there would be in a State having 8 per cent. or over?

Mr. HARRISON. What does the Senator mean by "the same degree of accountability?"

Mr. BUTLER. I mean precisely what I say, that there is not the same degree of accountability.

Mr. HARRISON. There is precisely the same degree of accountability, only the discretion as to the use of it is changed and enlarged. The sole difference is that in the States having less than 8 per cent. of illiteracy we enlarge the discretion of the Legislature in dealing with the fund.

Mr. BUTLER. In other words, it will be a surveillance over the States of the South and will not be over the States of the North.

Mr. HARRISON. Not a whit more. We require those States to report what they have done with the money, just as we require the Southern States to report, and to state what their school system is. They have to make the entire report precisely as they do from the other States; but we simply enlarge the discretion of the Legislature in order that this fund may do us some good. We have diminished it to such an extent that it will do us no good if we are to distribute it through our common-school districts, and we simply ask the privilege of using it so that it may do us some good.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I will ask another question. Can not the Legislatures in those States where there is 8 per cent. of illiteracy exercise the same judgment and be just as much trusted and relied upon for a faithful application of this money as those States that do not have so much illiteracy?

Mr. HARRISON. I say it is not a question whether the Legislatures are to be relied upon; it is simply a question of the direction by Congress of the money to the purpose for which we vote it. I would not be willing to give this discretion to any State having more than 8 per cent. of illiteracy and professing its inability to deal with the common-school question in that State. I say we ought to direct by the bill that it should go for common-school education alone.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to strike out the last line for the purpose of making a remark. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to this fact——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois will state what his amendment is.

Mr. LOGAN. To strike out the last line of the section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment is not in order at this time. The Senator from Illinois may move to strike out "eight" and insert "nine" if he likes.

Mr. LOGAN. I will do it, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. Move to strike out "eight" and insert "ten."

Mr. LOGAN. I will make any motion necessary, merely to call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to this proposition: Take what he says himself and what is said by the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Connecticut also, that the theory of the bill is to educate the colored people, they being the illiterate people and the people to whom we owe a great obligation as it is inferred from what has been said. If that be true, the only way to do that is by the distribution of the fund to common schools.

Now, take the State of Kansas. I do not know what the exact population is, but there are more colored people in the State of Kansas than there are to-day in the State of Maryland, perhaps more than there are in the State of Kentucky. There are more colored people in the State of Illinois than there are in Delaware.

Take the colored people in the North, who are a part of the colored people who were slaves prior to the late war; they are entitled to a portion of this distribution as well as the colored people of the South. If you use the money for the purpose of aiding the normal schools of the country, you then deprive the colored people of the North of a great portion of the benefits of this fund, not for the reason that they are not permitted to attend the normal schools, but the fact is that they do not attend them except a few. Take the two normal schools in my own State. In one of them I have never known more than one colored person to be educated, although it is located in a portion of the State where the most of the black population of the State live.

The adoption of this section strikes out all the power of your legislation to do the very act that you claim the bill proposes to do, and that is to apply the fund for the benefit of the colored people of the land. I look upon the theory of the bill as applicable to all classes, colored and white, who are illiterate; but according to the statement of the gentleman that it is peculiarly and particularly for the benefit of the colored people of the South or of the colored people of the North, for they are all of the same race——

Mr. HOAR. I did not say that.

Mr. LOGAN. No, but it has been said by different Senators. According to that theory this section is certainly not in accordance with the desire of the Senators who promote this bill. I do not believe that you can satisfy the people of this country with that section in it.

I live in a populous State. It is a rich State. The people are capable of educating their own children, and they do it. They do not stand in the scale to-day, as far as illiteracy or education is concerned; but, proud people as they are, if they are called upon to pay a great portion of the tax for assisting in the education of these people I think they will not refuse their own proportion and share of this fund that is to come from the National Government. Nor do I believe that there is a State in the East that will refuse it. Small or large, it makes no difference; all are entitled to it. If they pay the tax that produces this fund they are entitled to their pro rata share of it, no matter whether it is small or great. For those reasons I think the section ought not to remain in the bill.

Mr. HOAR. This whole thing is illustrated by the story of a colored man who was to raise a crop of cotton, of which he was to have a third. On being asked how it turned out, he said they only had a third of a crop, so he took the whole. This bill provides that in every State of the Union the Legislature may, in its discretion, apply 10 per cent. of the money that it receives to normal schools.

Mr. PLATT. Of what character?

Mr. HOAR. In the ninth section on the seventh page, for teachers of common schools. Normal schools are a kind of common school. It is there that the teachers of common schools are instructed.

Mr. LOGAN. No; I beg the Senator's pardon, they are not a part——

Mr. HOAR. Let me state it. Normal schools are in my opinion, and I affirm, a part of the common-school system. That is my opinion about it. They are so in our State. But whether they are or not, they are a method for providing teachers and instruments for the common schools. Every State in this Union will be entitled to appropriate a tenth of the money that it gets for that purpose, but in a good many of the States the whole sum they will get will not amount to a tenth that the other States will get, or much more, so where the amount they are to get is so small that it is not worth the cumbrous mechanism of distributing over the whole common schools you say that this object for which the other States are going usually to pay out as much of the money in actual sum as this little sum, all the States that have less than 8 per cent. of illiteracy may apply their entire proportion to this purpose. Some of the States have only 2 per cent. of illiteracy. New Hampshire has only 2 per cent. of illiteracy, I think.

Mr. BLAIR. New Hampshire has about 5 per cent. Wyoming has 2.67 per cent. of illiteracy.

Mr. HOAR. Well, 2 or 3 per cent. Instead of letting them pay the tenth of it to normal schools you let the Legislature if it chooses give the whole, and practically Massachusetts will not give as much, New Hampshire certainly will not, or Connecticut, or Vermont, or will Maine, give as much of the sum received by the bill, if the Legislatu reelect to give the whole to normal schools, as North Carolina or Georgia will, they being confined to the tenth. Georgia gets thirty-six times as much of this fund as New Hampshire, and she is at liberty therefore under the bill to give more than three times as much as New Hampshire is. That is the whole of it.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts——

Mr. HOAR. If I have any time left, I will give it to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LOGAN. You have time; you can answer it "yes" or "no." My question is in regard to the story the Senator told of the colored man who raised only a third of the cotton. I should like to have the Senator state whether the colored man got that third or whether he did not.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly, he got it.

Mr. LOGAN. Under this bill I do not think he would get it.

Mr. HOAR. The colored man was the legislator, who made the distribution himself.

Mr. ALLISON. The only argument I have heard in favor of this twelfth section is that it will be some inconvenience to States like New Hampshire and Massachusetts to distribute this fund on account of its being so small. I think those States had better subject themselves to some little inconvenience in order to have a general system with reference to this matter.

It is said that this is a discrimination by the bill against a portion of our country. I think it is of that nature, because, although no States are mentioned, it is true that this provision fixing 8 per cent. applies to every Northern State except Rhode Island, and the point above 8 per cent. includes every Southern State, and includes the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona.

Therefore I shall vote against this amendment and I shall vote with the Senator from Illinois to strike out this section, because I believe that if this section is to be retained the money should be distributed in the way that we have provided elsewhere. The object of the bill is practically stated in one of its sections, and I think this is in violation of the object of the bill:

> That the design of this act not being to establish an independent system of schools, but rather to aid for the time being in the development and maintenance of the school system established by local government, and which must eventually be wholly maintained by the States and Territories.

If that is the object of the bill, and I take it to be its object, I am not in favor of establishing a system of normal schools in every State of this Union which will grow in its expenditure, and which will come here year by year, not for these eight years but for all succeeding years, asking us to make appropriations to maintain that system of normal schools. I am in favor of striking out the twelfth section and leaving every State to stand upon the general provisions of the bill.

I will say further that my inclination is to vote for the amendment suggested by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] so as to confine the bill to the real purposes which the debate has disclosed to be the intent of it.

Mr. PLATT. The discussion upon this amendment makes more clear the wrong principle upon which this money is given. A word has arisen in the discussion which has fallen from the lips of almost every Senator who has discussed the bill which is dangerous in its tendency, and that is the word "distribution."

The bill professes to aid education, because, as is said, the colored race are illiterate and because certain States within which that illiteracy of the colored race exists are unable to remedy the condition of things. But the moment that you go outside of that, the moment that you forget the purpose of the bill and give money to the State of Kansas or to the Territory of Wyoming, which has less than 3 per cent. of illiteracy, then you come to the distribution of money among the States. That is a dangerous doctrine and one which I do not want to sanction.

I think that there is much to be feared from the idea which is prevailing in the Senate that if the Government is going to do anything in any one State to aid education it must, in order to do it, distribute some money to all the States. That is an evil which we have much reason to fear. It is for that reason that I do not desire that these States which have so small a percentage of illiteracy shall have any portion of this money. If there was no more illiteracy in this country than exists within the States which come within the amendment which I propose to offer and have not 9 per cent. of illiteracy, nobody would pretend to justify this bill. But there seems to be an idea that because in certain sections of the country there is a large proportion of illiteracy, and because the States there are not able to deal with it, the Senate and the Government can not deal with it unless they distribute some paltry pittance to all the States of the Union.

If this distribution be made it will be the first time in the history of this Government that there has ever been eo nomine a distribution of money to the States, and I fear that it will not be the last time, but it will be a precedent which will justify future distributions for other purposes.

I want to vote for this bill. I think the purpose of aiding in education where the States are unable to do all that should be done is a good one, and I want to vote for it. I wish the General Government to supply the means, but I do not want, in order to have such a bill pass, that we shall adopt the principle of taking money out of the national Treasury and distributing it among the States, for that is just what this bill is, and nothing else.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Connecticut has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN], to strike out the word "eight," in line 4, and to insert "nine."

Mr. LOGAN. I withdraw the last amendment that I offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Illinois is withdrawn. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON], to strike out the word "five," in line 3 of section 12, and to insert "eight." [Having put the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. PLATT. I do not think the question was understood.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana to strike out the word "five," in line 3 of section 12, and to insert the word "eight."

Mr. PLATT. The Senator from Illinois did not withdraw his first amendment?

Mr. LOGAN. No; I withdrew the last amendment. My first amendment is to strike out the whole section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment is not in order until the question is taken on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. LOGAN. I was going to ask whether the question to perfect the section first would not be taken before the question can be taken on the motion to strike out the section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question of perfecting must first be put. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Indiana to increase the per centum from 5 to 8 per cent. of the population, &c., in respect of using the money for normal schools.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 16, noes 22; no quorum voting.

Mr. HARRIS and Mr. HARRISON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

Mr. BECK (when Mr. HALE'S name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. I do not know how he would vote on this amendment, and I withhold my vote.

Mr. HARRIS (when Mr. FARLEY'S name was called). The Senator from California [Mr. FARLEY] is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. LAPHAM], and both Senators are temporarily absent.

Mr. LAMAR (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON], unless my vote should be necessary to make a quorum.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. On this amendment I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 25; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LOGAN. I now move to strike out the section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILSON in the chair). The Senator from Illinois moves to strike out section 12.

Mr. HAWLEY. I was rising to support that; I did not know but that the motion was pending already. I shall vote to strike out that section. We are developing, as we proceed with this discussion, the serious objections to the whole measure. Here is a great temptation. This provision of the bill would give to my State $31,000 to apply to the normal school.

Mr. BLAIR. Not necessarily; just as you please about it.

Mr. HAWLEY. But the State is abundantly able to take care of both her normal school and her common schools, and she does it. The State may say, "Here is so much clear gain; let us endow the normal school with it." If I have not sense enough to resist that temptation here—and people will scold me at home for voting against it—if I have not sense and courage enough to do it now, I wish to ask you how at the end of eight years you will stop doing it? You are beginning a system of distribution of surplus revenue to conduct within a State that which the States know they ought to do, that which they always have done, that which they are perfectly willing to do according to the best of their ability. You are by this bill beginning to teach them to go to the General Government when they feel a little unable to perform an obvious duty.

It is proposed to give to my State $31,000 for this purpose. We are behaving as if we had found some money somewhere that did not come by taxation; some that we were at liberty to spend in a general way, as if your wife should say, "Having inherited a thousand dollars from a kind uncle, now I will have a sealskin coat." But this money all came from taxation; it all came from the pockets of the people; it came for definite constitutional purposes. I lament that there is such a surplus. This is not the first error into which we shall be drawn by having $100,000,000 to spare. I wish we had not one dollar over the necessities of the Government and the sinking fund. We are embarking on a course that has nothing in my opinion but danger in the future to the best interests of the States.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana inquired about certain States having a certain percentage of illiteracy taking this money to be distributed among the higher grades of schools above common schools, and said for that reason that it would derange the common-school system to distribute it among them.

The objection I have to this bill from beginning to end is that whenever the United States goes inside a State to distribute funds there, it deranges their whole school system. You paralyze the energies of the people of the State which uphold and maintain the school system. You teach them to rely upon the Federal Government to support their schools, and when the eight years have passed away you have demoralized the people on the question of common schools, you will have a great system of common schools built up by what is called the munificence of the Federal Government, and your people in the States will have been taught not to rely upon themselves by taxation to support that system.

In the end you will injure the school system in every State. Let every State rely upon its own energies; upon its own manhood; upon its own resources, and you will do what the South is now doing, build up a common-school system. Let them alone, and at the end of these eight years, let alone, they will have a better common-school system than they will have if you give this $77,000,000 out of the Treasury of this Federal Government, and at the end of eight years you will have the children educated by the action of the people, by their exertion, by their own will, and by the effects they see from that exertion. You will have a common-school system going onward and upward, just like in Massachusetts, when they began in a small way fifty years ago; they started, and they have gone on step by step until they have a magnificent system. Let the States alone, and they will have that system.

Sir, I believe that it is demoralizing to a State for this Government to come in and help her people who are not helpless. I do not agree even with those gentlemen who believe their States need helping. The way to make a man worth help is to let him always rely upon himself and not upon others. The way to make a people independent—and the independence of a people is the jewel of a State—is for them to rely on themselves. Manhood is of the essence of success in private affairs. The manhood of the people of a State is the success of the State. Let us rely upon ourselves.

For this reason I am opposed to the whole system from beginning to end. I do not want this money distributed among the States, because I believe it will do more harm than good.

Mr. BLAIR. This section is not of any particular consequence. It is not worth fussing about. I hope it will be stricken out. I trust there will be no more time wasted upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] to strike out the twelfth section of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to offer an amendment that I introduced early in the debate, to come in at the end of the second section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio offers an amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add at the end of section 2:

And the sum so paid shall be apportioned among the several counties, cities, towns, parishes, and townships of each State or Territory, and, when practicable, among school districts, as defined by this act, in the proportions that the number of persons in such corporations, who being of the age of 10 years and over can not write, bears to the number of such persons in such State or Territory according to the census of 1880.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, section 2 of this bill makes an apportionment among the States of $77,000,000 according to illiteracy, or, to use another phrase, the phrase used in the bill, according to the number of persons in the different States that can not write. This rule of apportionment is a just rule under the circumstances, because the evil we are seeking to redress is the degree of illiteracy which grew out of the existence of slavery in the Southern States. The rule, therefore, of apportionment is correct.

The evil to be removed is the ignorance that prevails, especially among the great mass of the negroes that have been freed by emancipation, and therefore I am very willing to see this distribution made, although the State which I represent receives practically nothing from this appropriation—I think $100,000 out of $7,000,000—and I do not care whether it receives anything or not.

This money is to be divided among the States according to illiteracy. All that I desire, the only amendment I intend to propose to this bill and the only one I care to see enacted to carry out the idea of its distribution, is that this money shall be divided by the States according to the same rule of illiteracy. I wish to prescribe no other, and I do not see how any State or the people of any State can take offense or find fault with this rule of distribution. The money is given to them to enable the States to educate ignorant people in their limits, to remove to a certain extent the cloud of illiteracy that prevails in those States. The rule of justice that gives them so large a portion of this fund, nearly three-fourths, that gives them $11,600,000 out of $15,000,000, that rule which gives them this enormous disproportion according to population ought to be applied also in the distribution of this money among the people of the States according to their geographical divisions.

Now let me illustrate: In the valley of the Shenandoah, as beautiful a country as the sun shines upon, there is a rich people who cultivate a productive soil, where the degree of illiteracy does not exceed 8 or 10 per cent. In other portions of Virginia, as in the Petersburg region, there is an illiteracy that approaches 50 or 60 per cent. So while with 5,000 school children living in the valley of the Shenandoah there would be among them according to the tables furnished to us now about six hundred illiterate people who can not write, in the region about Petersburg there would be among 5,000 people over 3,000 that can not read and write.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I have but five minutes.

Mr. MAXEY. I was only going to call the attention of the Senator to one point where he is mistaken.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will hear the Senator; he says I am mistaken.

Mr. MAXEY. That would derange the entire system of distribution in the States, which is on the number of children within the scholastic age.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is precisely what I want to do. I desire to make this distribution depend upon the illiteracy of the different portions of the State; and, to carry out my illustration, is it right to give to 5,000 school children in the valley of the Shenandoah the same amount of money to aid in educating six hundred illiterate people as you would give to the region about Petersburg, where the same number of school children have among them more than 3,000 illiterate people, or five times as many? There is the principle.

I think there is no difficulty under the census of 1880 in dividing this money among the different counties or cities, and if you please among the school districts, according to the number of people to be taught there, among the people to be educated, and those communities ought to have this money in proportion to their illiteracy. To require of the people of the Petersburg region, for instance—I merely give that as an example—to educate 3,000 illiterate children in a neighborhood with the same money which would educate six hundred in the valley of the Shenandoah would be an act of injustice, and the same irregularity exists elsewhere. There are in many of the Southern States large portions of intelligent educated population. I am told that in some of the cities of the Southern States the degree of illiteracy falls clear down, so that it probably would not exceed 10 or 12 per cent., while in other portions, perhaps in Mississippi and some other places, the illiteracy rises to as high as 70 per cent. Now, if you are to deal with this question as a practical evil you must divide this money and apportion it among the illiterates of the South, and not by a general rule of distribution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I will submit a pro forma amendment, because I do not wish to speak again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio if I understand his amendment, supposing from hearing it read and from the remarks he has submitted that he proposes that this appropriation shall be followed by Federal authority not only to the States but to each and every county of the State, and from the county to every school district in the State and determine its distribution as between the school districts of the county. Is that the effect of the amendment?

Mr. SHERMAN. You invite me to answer a question, but I will not violate the rule. I will move to strike out——

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator can answer in my time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know that; but I move to strike out the last word in my amendment.

I answer then the Senator from Tennessee frankly no. This money ought to be expended by the State authorities. We can not, nor do I desire to, enter any State of this Union and expend this money. It must be done under the State authority by school teachers selected in the State, in school-houses established in the State, under the terms of this bill.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator allow me to ask if that State authority is to be controlled by the language of his amendment in the method of distributing this fund as between the school districts of the various counties of the various States?

Mr. SHERMAN. I answer, not in the slightest degree; but we can say where our money shall be expended. We may say where that money shall be apportioned. So, by the same rule that this money is paid to the States, we may say that it may be apportioned in that way, and when so apportioned it is left to the will of the State and to the people of the State, the Legislature of the State, to say how that money shall be expended.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator pardon me again?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. Does not his explanation mean exactly what I implied in my first question?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think not.

Mr. HARRIS. That his amendment controls the distribution of this fund not only as between the various counties in the State, but as between the various school districts in a county?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator asked me a moment ago as to the method of expenditure.

Mr. HARRIS. On the contrary, I undertook to ask, and thought I did ask, the Senator the same question that I now ask him.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, I will answer that this does nothing whatever except to apportion this money among the geographical divisions of the State, leaving to the State authorities the mode, method, manner, and means of expending the money; and it is perfectly just. You receive this money from the Government of the United States upon a certain rule of apportionment, which gives you an enormously larger sum than you would receive on the basis of population.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator would not the duties of the State officials then be purely and simply ministerial under this amendment?

Mr. SHERMAN. On the contrary, the duties of the State officials are absolute in the direction and control of this money. The money must be expended in the portions of the State provided for by this distribution just as it is to be distributed among the States, and it leaves the State authorities the same absolute control over the expenditure and administration of this money. Has not the United States, if it has the power to grant this money at all, the right to say where it shall be expended? Clearly so; and it seems to me that this forms a rule that would relieve the evil that is now complained of, the evil of illiteracy.

Even then I believe the fund here proposed to be distributed will be ample in counties and portions where there is a great amount of illiteracy. The fund given by the National Government would enable them to establish more schools and give greater facilities, while in other more favored regions where this degree of illiteracy does not prevail there would be a less fund to be distributed within that geographical region.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Allow me to ask the Senator a question. Does he establish the basis of illiteracy on the children of school age or take the illiteracy of all the people?

Mr. SHERMAN. I would prefer to take the rule of distribution according to the illiteracy of children; but I take the same rule that is provided for the distribution of the money among the States under the bill, so that the same rule of distribution would be applied to geographical divisions, taking the census of 1880 as a guide, and that is the only guide in both cases, taking the same rule precisely. It is to be applied in the distribution of this money among the geographical portions of the different States as it is applied when they receive the money from the national Treasury. The more I have thought of this matter, over and over again, I see no practical difficulty in the way.

The table and amount of apportionment will be furnished by the Secretary of the Interior under the language of this bill, and then the States receive this money just as fully and absolutely as they would receive it under the bill as it now stands, only, however, that it is imposed upon the State as one of the conditions of this grant that it shall distribute this money according to illiteracy, giving greater facilities where there are more to be taught and less school facilities where there are less to be taught, and not giving, as in the case I put a moment ago, the same amount of money to educate six hundred illiterate children in the Shenandoah Valley as you would give to educate thirty-four hundred in the region around Petersburg, in what is called the Black Belt.

That is all there is in this amendment. I have thought of it in every possible aspect that can present itself to my mind. It seems to me just and fair. And I believe it will remove much of the difficulty in the minds of many Senators here in regard to this bill, and does not in any sense encroach on the rights or powers of the States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Ohio has expired.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, if this bill is anything it is an educational bill, and I should like to have eliminated from it on one side or the other or both sides of this Chamber the whole question of race and color, and let us understand that this money is going to be appropriated, if at all, for the education of the children of this country. We have settled all the preliminary questions, chief among which was the power of this Government under the Constitution to make this appropriation.

Now, the question which the Senator from Ohio raises would be answered back at once from the State of Virginia that if you appropriate this money in this discriminating way, by counties and by school districts, if you please, so as to give a certain section of that State more of it than you give to another because there is more illiteracy there, you encroach on the State's province. Has it ever occurred to the Senator from Ohio that that rich Shenandoah Valley of which he speaks has to contribute a much larger proportion of the State school fund than the south side section, and yet our State distributes it equally among all those people.

There is the answer to the proposition. If the State of Virginia is expected to distribute this school fund equally without regard to who pays it or who gets the advantage of it, why should we stand here and attempt to discriminate in that way?

That, sir, is the answer to it all, and that would make it so unpopular that a school system of this kind would not live a year. I want a system and I want it so popular as that it will outlive me, but if you start it in the way the Senator from Ohio proposes it will not live a year.

Can we not eliminate the question of race and color, the question of sections, and not seek to narrow it down to sections of country or sections of State? If we are for a system of free and general education and this Government has money to give to that purpose, and has the constitutional right to give it, let us give it, give it at once, give it promptly, not stintingly or hesitatingly.

I undertake to say further that if you will read the amendment of the Senator from Ohio and if the Senator will read it again himself he would not undertake to answer a bill in chancery, for he says "as far as practicable." The language, if I heard the amendment aright, is "as far as practicable;" and I undertake to say that that is not the kind of language to be used in drawing a great bill like this, where it is to undergo construction perhaps by the courts. I think the amendment itself is much more impracticable than the law would be if the amendment were ingrafted upon it. I hope it will be the pleasure of the Senate to vote down such an amendment as that, and let this fund be distributed without regard to race or color, for the free and general education of all the children of all the States; and unless we do that we shall have done nothing when we have passed this bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I hope this amendment will not be adopted, and I do not believe it will be. It is not only impracticable to carry its provisions out in the counties and school districts of the counties, but in my judgment it is utterly destructive of the bill itself. It proposes that the States shall receive this money on the basis of the illiteracy of those States, and that they shall distribute the fund in the counties and school districts according to the degree of illiteracy. How is it possible for a State to ascertain that? The only possible way for the States to distribute the money is to distribute it among the children that are in attendance on the schools, for every child that goes to school can in two or three weeks learn his alphabet.

You would have then in one district degrees of illiteracy which it would be impossible for any school superintendent on earth ever to comprehend. You would have one class that had got in their a, b, c's, and another class that had progressed as far as "baker," and you might have another district that had got to addition. Who is going to make this calculation? You will have to take a census in every county and school district in the State in order to ascertain the degree of illiteracy and the proportion that each school district would be entitled to of the fund that fell to the State in the general distribution. It is impracticable. It is the most ridiculous mode I ever saw for the distribution of a fund for any purpose on earth.

Mr. SHERMAN. Allow me to say to my friend that the rule is the census of 1880, the same rule by which the distribution is made among the States. It is not a changeable rule at all, but the rule of 1880 extends to the counties as it does to the States. There is no practical difficulty in the way.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But then the object of distributing this fund is to educate the children, and the States are the best judges. If you intend that they shall manage it, let them manage it; if you intend that the Federal Government shall manage it, say so; but do not make this a condition. The States are well enough disposed to this whole matter. It is abundantly proved before the Senate from the highest educational authorities of this country that no people is more willing to elevate the negro than the people of the South; but this proposition is impracticable and can not be carried out.

Mr. BLAIR. Just one moment. I have quite a number of pages of memoranda which I have had taken from the minutes of the census, showing that the enumeration districts oftentimes included counties, sometimes part of one county and part of another. In short, the census was so taken that it is utterly impracticable to ascertain the illiteracy by counties, and therefore the basis of distribution which the Senator from Ohio speaks of would utterly fail.

So far as the bill itself is concerned it provides that the distribution shall be made in such a way as to equalize the money that goes to each child per capita throughout the State. This fund goes in with the funds of the State, and both making one aggregate, are so distributed as to produce an equalization of school privileges throughout the State. I do not think that anything could be more just, and this amendment certainly would practically defeat the bill.

Mr. CALL. The best reply that can be made to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, which is intended as an impeachment of the good faith and the capacity of the States to make this distribution as may be required for the interest of the illiterate people, is to be found in a statement which I have from the superintendent of schools in Florida showing the distribution and the taxation for school purposes in that State. It is as follows:

Statistics do show that some, if not all, Southern States raise much more money for educational purposes in proportion to their assessed values than some of the most prosperous of the Northern States, and the newspaper press has not neglected to assert the fact, and in support of it we give certain figures in the case of Florida as compared with eight States, fairly representing the area of Northern territory from Maine to Kansas:

| | School receipts. | Assessed valuation. | Population. |
|---|---|---|---|
| Kansas | $1,740,593 | $170,813,375 | 996,096 |
| Rhode Island | 582,965 | 258,522,198 | 276,531 |
| New York | 10,895,765 | 2,679,139,133 | 5,082,871 |
| Maine | 1,089,414 | 235,978,716 | 648,936 |
| New Jersey | 1,914,447 | 527,451,222 | 1,131,116 |
| Michigan | 3,772,321 | 810,000,000 | 1,636,937 |
| Indiana | 4,480,306 | 720,944,231 | 1,978,301 |
| Minnesota | 1,679,297 | 258,055,543 | 780,773 |
| Total | 26,165,108 | 5,660,904,416 | 12,531,561 |

A statement of expenditures per capita of school children in the eight States, obtained from the report of the Secretary of the Interior, volume 4 of Messages and Documents, 1881 and 1882, shows these figures: Kansas, $4.68; New York, $6.57; New Jersey, $5.22; Rhode Island, $9.16; Maine, $4.61; Indiana, $5.80; Minnesota, $4.13; Michigan, $5.27. Florida (obtained from the official reports of the comptroller and treasurer of the State of Florida for the year 1883, $3.54 per capita of school children.

The assessed value of property in the eight States given amounts to about $444.78 for each person (using the figures given in the census for 1880 for ascertaining the population), and the average expenditures in the same States for each child of school age is $5.67. The assessed value of property in Florida will average to each person about $205.20 (using the census figures of 1880 for population), and the average expenditure as above given for each child of school age is $3.54. The census figures are adopted to find the population of Florida, and the property valuation is from State assessment of 1883, which is nearly double that of 1880, and allows the figures to show much more to the advantage of the eight States in the following comparative results: $444 per capita; $5.67 average expenditure for each child in the eight States; per cent., 1.217. $205 per capita; $3.54 average expenditure each child in Florida; per cent., 1.727.

The permanent investment of school fund increased from $250,284.25 in 1882 (the accumulations of thirty-seven years from March, 1845) to $429,984.25 in 1884—an increase of $178,700 in two years, being nearly 75 per cent. increase. We add the following summary of the State educational finances, as given us by State Treasurer L'Engle:

|---|---|
| Amount raised for school purposes in Florida: | |
| General school tax raised by the State | $55,297 30 |
| County school tax raised by the counties | 169,543 72 |
| Total raised by taxation | 224,840 72 |
| Add interest upon the permanent investment for educational funds | 37,507 00 |
| Aggregate school receipts | 262,347 72 |

From this statement it will be seen that in the eight States mentioned—Kansas, Rhode Island, New York, Maine, New Jersey, Michigan, Indiana, and Minnesota—the per capita valuation of property from the reports of the census is $444, the average school expenditure $5.67 for each child in those eight States, the per cent. being 1.217. In Florida the per capita is $205 of property, $3.54 is the average expenditure for each child in the State, and the per cent. is 1.727, exceeding that of these eight States, which is equally distributed to every colored and white child according to the degree of illiteracy throughout that State, impartially and without any kind of distinction—a taxation greater than that according to the per capita valuation of property in the eight States which I have named.

Now, I ask the Senator from Ohio, in all fairness, why impeach the good faith and the capacity of these States to make the distribution of the fund given by the Government, as they have cared for the fund raised by this very onerous taxation upon themselves?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, there is one consideration to which I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio and the Senate. The amendment, as I understand it, proposes that the money appropriated by this bill shall be distributed in each school district according to the number of illiterates in each.

The object of this bill is to equalize school privileges throughout the States. These conditions occur in many of the Southern States—they do not occur in Ohio; there are sparsely settled districts in which there are a few children, living so far apart that a school of over ten or twelve scholars can hardly be got together. The land is poor and the people are poor. If this money is distributed according to the amendment of the Senator, the children in these poor districts, living so far apart, being obliged to attend the schools at which there are so few scholars, the schools in those districts would receive such a small proportion of the money distributed that it would do no appreciable good.

In one of these districts, and there are plenty of them in the South, there are not more than ten or fifteen children who can be got together near enough to go to a single school. If you distribute the fund per capita to these it would produce so little that enough money could not be raised to get a competent teacher. Then, again, there would be a larger amount of illiteracy owing to the larger population in a rich school district, and that illiteracy would result, not from an inability in that district to furnish the means to have schools, but from an indisposition on the part of children or their parents to go to the school, and the result would be that you would deprive the children of these poor and sparsely settled districts of any means of education, and you would pile up unnecessarily in the rich districts, thickly populated, an amount of money not needed by them, and which could not be used, because the children would not go to school or their parents would not send them.

The bill requires enough already.

In the eleventh section it is provided that the money shall be so used "as to provide, as near as may be, for the equalization of school privileges to all the children of the school age." Let us observe that rule—and that is the soul of this bill—to educate everybody. It is not that each individual shall get from the bill an equal amount. He may not need it; the locality in which he lives may furnish all the means needed, while the locality in another place would not be able to do it. I think the amendment of the Senator from Ohio would result in destroying the equality provided in the eleventh section of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio withdraw his pro forma amendment?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio as an amendment to section 2.

Mr. SHERMAN. On that I should like to have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORGAN. I have noticed on page 10, section 13, of this bill the following language as the bill has been amended by the Senate:

The Secretary of the Interior shall have power to hear and examine any complaints of misappropriation or unjust discrimination in the use of the funds herein provided, and shall report to Congress the results thereof.

Mr. HARRISON. That amendment has not been acted on or proposed yet. I shall propose it when we get to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not withdrawn any amendment except the pro forma amendment which I moved.

Mr. MORGAN. I know. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to ask him whether this amendment has been adopted by the caucus?

Mr. HARRISON. It has not been acted on.

Mr. MORGAN. By the caucus?

Mr. HARRISON. I should not like to disclose to the Senator what took place in the caucus.

Mr. MORGAN. You would not?

Mr. HARRISON. No, I would not feel at liberty to do that. I have only to say to the Senator that we had better success in the way of harmony in the caucus we had here than the Senator's friends had at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. MORGAN. Because you had more unity of purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HAWLEY in the chair). The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to add to the second section.

Mr. MORGAN. I am speaking to that, rather in an indirect way; but still I am speaking to that amendment. I thought it was a legitimate inquiry to enter upon whether or not this part of the bill which I find in section 13 was dictated by the caucus. If that part of the amendment can get in, which I suppose the Senator from Ohio contemplates will be the fact, because a caucus has acted upon it, and nobody denies that, then I think I discover the reason why the Senator from Ohio is so desirous of having this in here. It gives him an opportunity of having some more investigations.

Instead of being confined to States and trying them here at the bar of the Senate, he can go into districts and counties, and instead of having two investigations pending here have two hundred after this bill shall have been adopted and after we shall have entered it upon the laws of this land. Look at the opportunity here that will be furnished for these political investigations:

The Secretary of the Interior shall have power to hear and examine any complaints of misappropriation or unjust discrimination in the use of the funds herein provided, and shall report to Congress the results thereof.

As the bill proposed, that is confined to States, State by State. As the Senator from Ohio proposes to amend it, it will extend to districts and counties and neighborhoods, and he can fix the place; he can go to this delectable point about Petersburg, where he says illiteracy is so great, though Virginia seems to have had some of her most notable statesmen to represent her from Petersburg. I was astonished to hear the complaint the Senator from Ohio made against that neighborhood and that district.

I am persuaded that the Senator from Ohio is at heart as much opposed to this bill as I am, and I gather it from the fact that he is attempting to put upon this bill a set of amendments which, if they succeed, if they are incorporated into the bill, will result in putting the bill in such an attitude before the Senate and before the country as that nobody can propose to vote for it.

I think I can not be mistaken upon this proposition. The Senator from Ohio is rarely mistaken in any view that he takes of a public question. He looks far into the future, far down into the recesses of that which lies beyond; and here he proposes in connection with his amendment to have the Senate of the United States giving for the next ten years to come, and perhaps twenty, or at least as long as the Republican party has a hope or expectation of maintaining control of this Government, an opportunity of having investigation after investigation into questions of whether there will have been some misappropriations or discriminations made in the neighborhoods about in the different States in the Union.

When the Senator's amendment comes to be tested by this part of the bill which the caucus has recommended, and which I suppose it is required shall be adopted, I think I see a very great difficulty in the adoption of the amendment and also of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

Mr. BECK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. I would vote "nay" if he were here.

Mr. HAMPTON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY]. I should vote "nay" were he present.

Mr. JONES, of Florida (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. LAMAR (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON]. I am against the amendment.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. RANSOM. My colleague [Mr. VANCE] is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. My colleague, if present, would vote "nay."

Mr. LAMAR. On consultation with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR], I learn that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] would vote "nay" if present, and therefore I vote "nay."

Mr. CAMDEN. I wish to announce that I am paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] on the bill itself, but I understand that the pair does not extend to the amendments.

The result was announced—yeas 7, nay 35; as follows:

YEAS—7.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRISON. I now move to amend section 13 by striking out down to and including the word "governor," in the third line, and inserting what I send to the Chair. I said to the Senator from Alabama when he called attention to this language that I intended to propose a modification of it before it was voted upon. The Secretary will take this modification as I suggest it:

That no second or other allotment shall be made under this act to any State or Territory unless the governor of such State or Territory shall first file with the Secretary of the Interior, &c.

I propose to strike out the words "on or before the 30th day of June of each year," because it is an arbitrary date, and it might be that the report might come in afterward. It is simply to make the condition that this report shall be made first before the allotment is made—I think it is better—so that the section will read:

That no second or other allotment shall be made under this act to any State or Territory unless the governor of such State or Territory shall first file with the Secretary of the Interior a statement, certified by him, &c.

As the bill runs now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana moves to amend the thirteenth section. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 13 it is moved to strike out the following words:

That the Secretary of the Interior shall receive from the governor of each State and Territory a report, to be made by or through such governor.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

That no second or other allotment shall be made under this act to any State or Territory unless the governor of such State or Territory shall first file with the Secretary of the Interior a statement, certified by him.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Massachusetts suggests that instead of "second or other," it should be "second or later," so as distinctly to exclude the first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator modify the amendment?

Mr. HARRISON. I will substitute the word "later" for "other."

Mr. HOAR. Say "subsequent."

Mr. HARRISON. Very well; say "second or subsequent allotment."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know whether the amendment as acted upon includes the striking out of the words "on or before the 30th day of June of each year." I inquire whether the question was taken on that also?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not been taken on that.

Mr. HARRISON. Then I move to strike out those words.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana moves to amend section 13 further, by striking out the words "on or before the 30th day of June of each year," in line 4.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Now, in line 10 of the same section, I move to strike out the words "section 4 of."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Now, Mr. President, at the end of this section I move to insert what is in the hands of the Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves to amend the section further. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 37 of section 13, after the word "herein," it is proposed to insert:

If it shall appear to the Secretary of the Interior that the funds received under this act for the preceding year by the State or Territory have been faithfully applied to the purposes contemplated by this act, and that the conditions thereof have been observed, then the Secretary of the Interior shall distribute the next year's appropriation as is hereinbefore provided. The Secretary of the Interior shall have power to hear and examine any complaints of misappropriation or unjust discrimination in the use of the funds herein provided, and shall report to Congress the results thereof.

Mr. BUTLER. Now, Mr. President, I want to read that amendment as it has been amended. I want it to go in the RECORD. I do not remember the exact langauge of the amendment which has been adopted, and so I shall begin after the words "each year," on line 5:

File with the Secretary of the Interior a statement, certified by him—

That is the governor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment as agreed to at the beginning of section 13 will be read if there be no objection.

Mr. BUTLER. I shall be glad to have it done.

Mr. MORGAN. Let the whole section be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That no second or later allotment shall be made under this act to any State or Territory unless the governor of such State shall first file with the Secretary of the Interior a statement——

Mr. HARRISON. The Chair will allow me. I desire to correct a clerical error. The word "later" was changed to "subsequent"—"second or subsequent."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recollects that the change was made. The word "subsequent" will be inserted.

Mr. BUTLER. Now I ask the secretary to read the rest of the section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). The residue of the section will be read, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading, as follows:

a statement certified by him, giving a detailed account of the payments or disbursement made of the school fund apportioned to his State or Territory and received by the State or Territorial treasurer or officer under this act, and of the balance in the hands of such treasurer or officer withheld, unclaimed, or for any cause unpaid or unexpended, and also the amount expended in such State or Territory as required by section 8 of this act, and also of the number of public, common, and industrial schools; the number of teachers employed, the total number of children taught during the year and in what branches instructed, the average daily attendance, and the relative number of white and colored children, and the number of months in each year schools have been maintained in each school district, and such other information in relation to the use of the school fund and the condition of common-school education as the Secretary of the Interior may require. And if any State or Territory shall misapply or allow to be misapplied, or in any manner appropriated or used other than for the purposes herein required, the funds or any part thereof received under the provisions of this act, or shall fail to comply with the conditions herein prescribed, or to report as herein provided, through its proper officers, the disposition thereof and the other matters herein prescribed to be so reported, such State or Territory shall forfeit its right to any subsequent apportionment by virtue hereof until the full amount so misapplied, lost, or misappropriated shall have been replaced by such State or Territory and applied as herein required, and until such report shall have been made: Provided, That if the public schools in any State admit pupils not within the ages herein specified it shall not be deemed a failure to comply with the conditions herein.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will now be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

If it shall appear to the Secretary of the Interior that the funds received under this act for the preceding year by the State or Territory have been faithfully applied to the purposes contemplated by this act, and that the conditions thereof have been observed, then the Secretary of the Interior shall distribute the next year's appropriation as is hereinbefore provided. The Secretary of the Interior shall have power to hear and examine any complaints of misappropriation or unjust discrimination in the use of the funds herein provided, and shall report to Congress the results thereof.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on this amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. I want to call attention to that portion of the section which follows line 20:

And such other information in relation to the use of the school fund and the condition of common-school education as the Secretary of the Interior may require.

The amendment has the imprimatur of the caucus upon it, evidently, and I suppose it will be gulped and swallowed without any grimace or hesitation by our friends on this side, having been passed on by the caucus. I want to call the attention of the Senate, however, to its provisions:

If it shall appear to the Secretary of the Interior that the funds received under this act for the preceding year by the State or Territory have been faithfully applied to the purposes contemplated by this act, and that the conditions thereof have been observed, then the Secretary of the Interior—

Not Congress; no other power, no other authority, but the Secretary of the Interior—

Shall distribute the next year's appropriation as is hereinbefore provided. The Secretary of the Interior shall have power to hear and examine any complaints of misappropriation or unjust discrimination in the use of the funds herein provided, and shall report to Congress the results thereof.

I think that might have been followed by an amendment: "whereupon Congress shall appoint a committee of investigation to proceed to such portions of the South as the Secretary of the Interior may suggest, and have a report made to Congress." I think that might as well have gone along on all fours with the amendment as far it has gone.

For one I can not vote for a measure that so thoroughly and completely emasculates the independence of the States and destroys the autonomy and self-respect of the respective Commonwealths. I have not stickled about State rights in this debate or any other. I do not propose to do so; but we have a written Constitution, and I have sworn to obey it; and while I shall not, as I said, stickle about strict construction or State rights, it does seem to me that that instrument is entitled to some respect at our hands; and if this bill with this amendment and this section does not completely destroy the self-respect and independence of the States of this Union, I do not see how the Senate could go to work to accomplish it.

Mr. GARLAND. I want to move an amendment on line 45 of section 13 in the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON], to strike out the words "hear and examine" and insert in lieu thereof the word "receive." I do not object to the provision objected to by the Senator from South Carolina, for I think it is a proper enough safeguard for the Secretary of the Interior, who has charge of this matter throughout, to see that the law has been complied with. Indeed, that runs through everything in the relations of the General Government with the States. But when we give the Secretary of the Interior power to "hear and examine," that seems to put the power in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior to institute and organize a sort of court to arraign before its bar the officials of the States who have control of the management and disbursement of this fund.

I am very clearly of opinion that if that power is given the Supreme Court, on a contest, would hold it to be unconstitutional, because in the very early history of this Government, in the somewhat celebrated case of Hepburn in the second or third of Dallas, the judges on the circuit, Chief-Justice Jay being on circuit at the time, declined to exercise powers that Congress put upon them in the nature of commissioners, holding and stating the broad principle that these Departments of the Government were separate, and you could not delegate to one the powers of either of the others; you could not make a judge an executive officer, and you could not make an executive officer a judge. This attempts to do that.

Then I do not care to encounter a judicial combat about this matter or to incur any litigation in regard to it. It would be unseemly for the Secretary of the Interior to send for persons and papers and make himself a kind of court to inquire into the distribution of this fund. I should have no objection to his receiving any complaint that might be made and turning it over for Congress in the exercise of its authority to see what should be done in the premises.

I do not think that on reflection the friends of this amendment will care to go so far as to say that the Secretary of the Interior shall be constituted a court to hear and examine questions of this character. In all these transactions as one of the executive officers of the Government he has to make his annual report through the President to Congress of all proceedings in his Department. That is well enough. Whatever complaint is made or whatever praise or credit in reference to the distribution of this fund is due I am perfectly willing he shall receive and turn over to Congress for its consideration, but I think in good faith the friends of this measure who have stood by it all along had better let these words go out and insert the word "receive."

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Arkansas seems to object that there is some judicial function conferred upon the Secretary of the Interior. I do not understand these terms so at all. It does authorize him to collect information. The amendment which the Senator from Arkansas proposes would simply make him the medium through which a petition or remonstrance or communication to Congress would come to us. It would not give him power to act on the information or to verify the statements made in it.

All that was intended by this provision was that if there was complaint made in any section of the country of an unjust discrimination in the use of this fund the Secretary of the Interior should receive that complaint, and that he should have some power to examine into the question whether the law was or was not in the particular case violated, and report his opinion or conclusion to Congress, to report not simply the complaint but any other information that came to him or that he was authorized by law to collect, just as all the Departments do, just as the Secretary of the Interior does with reference to the timber laws and various other laws the supervision of which is with him. He makes some inquiries with reference to them, and he reports the facts to Congress.

I do not think the amendment is subject to the criticism which the Senator from Arkansas makes, and I assure him that it was not intended to incorporate here anything that should be offensive to the true friends of the bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana a question. I understood him to say there was no judical power conferred on the Secretary of the Interior. I see that he is authorized to do certain things on a misapplication of the fund, that the State or Territory so misapplying the money or failing to do certain other things shall forfeit the right to any subsequent apportionment. Now, I apprehend that somebody must determine whether there has been a failure. There must be some person to declare the forfeiture. Who is that person, I should like to ascertain from the Senator?

Mr. HARRISON. Ultimately Congress, of course; but if Congress has made an appropriation and has directed the Secretary of the Treasury to pay it out to certain descriptions of persons or to certain persons upon certain proof being made, the Secretary of the Treasury must judge whether a person applying is of the description of persons authorized to receive it, and he must judge whether the proof which the person makes is according to the law.

This feature runs through our appropriation bills. When we pass an appropriation bill, bills for private claims, pension claims, what do we do? We say that a person who has served in the Army and who has suffered a disability so and so shall receive a certain pension. Who settles the question whether he has or not? This same Secretary of the Interior decides. So in all patent matters.

Now, what we propose here is that when we appropriate money to be paid out to certain classes of States who have done so and so in their own legislation, we must primarily commit the question to the person who is to pay out the money or to certify it for payment by the Secretary of the Treasury; and, of course, when he reports to us what he has done it is all subject to the control of Congress. If we find that he has withheld an appropriation that ought to have been distributed, it is perfectly competent and perfectly easy for Congress to direct its distribution.

Mr. BUTLER. Suppose the governor of a State should be dissatisfied——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is yet entitled to the floor. He was speaking, and asked a question which was being answered in his time.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator from Delaware yield to me for a minute?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Suppose the governor of a State should be dissatisfied with the finding of the Secretary of the Interior, what showing would that governor of a State have for a hearing?

Mr. HARRISON. Just what I suggested. If there is a complaint made from any section of the Senator's State, if there is an unequal and an unfair distribution of this fund, if the statute has been violated in one feature and that complaint is made to the Secretary of the Interior, undoubtedly if the governor chooses to present to him any statement showing that that allegation is false he will have opportunity to do it, and if he is dissatisfied with the action of the Secretary of the Interior, which as the disbursing officer he must take, he has only to lay the case before Congress and ask us to direct the appropriation notwithstanding.

Mr. BUTLER. This is the first time in this debate that I have heard the Secretary of the Interior called a disbursing officer. I do not understand that he handles a dollar of money.

Mr. HARRISON. I did not use the term accurately. He certifies for disbursement to the Secretary of the Treasury; he draws the requisition.

Mr. BUTLER. He does not disburse money.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator's criticism is verbally correct, but not very important.

Mr. MORGAN. The bill provides in section 13:

> And if any State or Territory * * * shall fail to comply with the conditions herein prescribed, or to report as herein provided, through its proper officers, the disposition thereof, and the other matters herein prescribed to be so reported, such State or Territory shall forfeit its right to any subsequent apportionment by virtue hereof until the full amount so misapplied, lost, or misappropriated shall have been replaced by such State or Territory and applied as herein required, and until such report shall have been made: Provided, &c.

Now, there is a forfeiture. What is the meaning of a forfeiture in law? It means the destruction by some act of a right that has been granted depending upon a condition subsequent. In order to determine the forfeiture there must be some person who has judicial authority to ascertain its existence. A forfeiture relates to the surrender of a right, not to the surrender merely of a privilege or an expectation. In this bill it certainly relates to the surrender of a right, because the money has been appropriated and has been assigned to the State, and, therefore, the term "forfeited" applies to the surrender or the destruction of some right that has existed. In order that that forfeiture shall be made complete there must be some sort of judicial authority exercised to get it. It may be by a judge or it may be by some special officer designated by law to give effect to the forfeiture.

Now we proceed to ascertain from this bill, or the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana, who is the judge, who is the officer empowered by the bill for the law to declare and enforce by this forfeiture. It is declared in this language:

> If it shall appear to the Secretary of the Interior that the funds received under this act for the preceding year by the State or Territory have been faithfully applied to the purposes contemplated by this act, and that the conditions thereof have been observed, then the Secretary of the Interior shall distribute the next year's appropriation as is hereinbefore provided.

The Secretary of the Interior may declare the forfeiture, or in the event he finds that ground does not exist for declaring the forfeiture he may go on and distribute the fund for another year, leaving the whole judicial power of ascertainment and determination, according to the very terms of the amendment and the terms of the bill, in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior. While this is the case, the Senator from Arkansas says, "True enough the Secretary of the Interior may declare the forfeiture, he may prevent the money from coming to the State on the second allotment or any subsequent allotment, but he must be allowed to hear but not examine any complaints of misappropriation," &c. That is a very fine softening of the subject. At the same time it does not affect the material merits of the question.

Why should we say to the Secretary of the Interior, who has the power to hear and the power to determine the forfeiture and the power to step in between the State and the money and to prevent a State from getting the second or subsequent installment of this appropriation, "you may hear any complaints of misappropriation or of any unjust discrimination but you must not examine into the same?" There is a very startling want of logic in that proposition, it occurs to my mind.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Alabama has expired.

Mr. MORGAN. That is all I desire to say, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. BUTLER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. BLAIR. Let the question be stated again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 13, line 45, it is proposed to strike out the words "hear and examine" and insert in lieu thereof the word "receive;" so as to read:

> The Secretary of the Interior shall have power to receive any complaints of misappropriation or unjust discrimination in the use of the funds herein provided, and shall report to Congress the results thereof.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

Mr. MORGAN (when Mr. LAPHAM's name was called). The Senator from New York [Mr. LAPHAM] is paired with the Senator from California [Mr. FARLEY]. My pair has been transferred.

Mr. PLUMB (when Mr. VANCE's name was called). The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] and myself are paired on this proposition. If the Senator from North Carolina were present he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 23, nays 23; as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate being equally divided, the motion is lost. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. GEORGE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

Mr. JONES, of Florida, (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL]. If he were here I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. PLUMB. I am paired on this question with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE].

Mr. CAMDEN (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS]. I withdraw my vote.

Mr. ALLISON. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. HILL]. I vote "yea."

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. In section 14, line 4, after the word "Territory," I move to strike out the words "or the District of Columbia;" so as to read:

Whether any State or Territory has forfeited its right to receive its apportionment, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. In section 14, line 7, after the word "Territory," I move to strike out the words "and the District of Columbia;" so as to read:

And each State and Territory from which such apportionment shall be withheld, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. I move to strike out all after the word "Congress" where it first occurs in section 14, line 10, being the following words:

And if the next Congress shall not direct such share to be paid, it shall be added to the general educational fund for distribution among the other States and the Territories and District of Columbia which shall be entitled to the benefit of the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. In section 14, line 7, after the word "forfeiture," I move to strike out the following words:

And each State and Territory from which such apportionment shall be withheld shall have the right to appeal from such decision of the Secretary of the Interior to Congress.

I do not want my State, I will say, for one State, to be put into the attitude in this Government of taking an appeal from the decision of an inferior officer of the Government to the Congress of the United States. The idea that a State must come here in order to get her rights and take an appeal to the Congress of the United States is something that I think is rather beneath her dignity.

The Secretary of the Interior, when he is confirmed in his office, has to get the advice and consent of the Senators from that State in connection with the rest of the Senators representing as embassadors other States in this Union, and I do not care to have him boosted up into that sort of dignity and authority in this Government as that my State has to take an appeal from his decision upon a matter of constitutional right belonging to her. Her dignity may have been trampled under foot, her people may not deserve in the opinion of other States the respect of communities which are organized as great constitutional governments in this land; but so far as I am concerned, my State at least enjoys my confidence and my honor and my esteem and my reverence to that degree that I shall never consent either to take an appeal for her from the Secretary of the Treasury or the Secretary of the Interior, or to sit in the Senate of the United States to hear such an appeal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. BROWN. I can not quite agree with my friend from Alabama on this amendment. My State is exactly in that attitude now. At the last session of Congress we passed a statute appropriating thirty-five thousand five hundred and some odd dollars to the State of Georgia, and the Comptroller of the Treasury has credited that to a debt which Georgia as a State does not owe, and I have had to appeal to Congress to relieve us from the decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him whether he had to get the assistance of an act of Congress to take an appeal before he came here, or did he come as a Senator and introduce a bill?

Mr. BROWN. Of course I came and offered a bill, but I had to appeal from the decision.

Mr. MORGAN. No; there was no appeal in that case. An appeal humiliates a man when you require him to go from a superior to an inferior jurisdiction.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama has once spoken on this amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken resulted—yeas 6, nays 40; as follows:

YEAS—6.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRISON. In section 15, line 3, I move to strike out the words "and the District of Columbia" after the word "Territories," so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior shall be charged with the practical administration of this act in the Territories through the Commissioner of Education, who shall report annually to Congress its practical operation, and briefly the condition of common and industrial education as affected thereby throughout the country, which report shall be transmitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Interior, accompanying the report of his Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. I move to amend the first section by adding at the close of the section as it now stands amended:

And the first-named sum of $7,000,000 is hereby appropriated for the purposes of this act.

As the bill now stands it is simply an enactment that there shall be annually appropriated the sum specified.

Mr. ALLISON. I think I would let that go until after we get the bill through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire moves to amend section 1 by adding thereto what will be read by the Secretary.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. Upon consultation with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, who thinks it would be better to withraw the amendment for the present, I will do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. PLATT. I move to amend by adding as an additional section what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add the following as an additional section:

SEC. —. That no portion of the money to be expended under the provisions of this act shall be expended or paid in any State in which the number of persons of 10 years of age and upward who can not write does not exceed 9 per cent. of the whole population thereof.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to this amendment.

Mr. PLATT. I do not know that I desire to say anything more upon the amendment than I have said upon the discussion of a former amendment, at least but little. I am, as I said, very much in favor of what I suppose to be the purpose and object of the bill. I shall bring myself to vote for the bill, however, with very great reluctance, if at all, if this amendment is not adopted. I desire to protest earnestly against any action of Congress which recognizes the doctrine of the distribution of the money from the Treasury of the United States among the States. I fear that this does.

One single other suggestion. The bill professes not to inaugurate the system of national aid for education as a permanent system. In section 8 as it stands I find these words:

That the design of this act not being to establish an independent system of schools, but rather to aid for the time being in the development and maintenance of the school system established by local government, and which must eventually be wholly maintained by the States and Territories wherein they exist, it is hereby provided, &c.

I submit that the bill is entirely inconsistent if it extends this aid to States which do not need the money. At the end of the appropriations which are contemplated by the bill, no Senator supposes that the States in which illiteracy is the greatest will have such a perfected school system that there will be as small a percentage of illiteracy as in the States which under my amendment would not receive any of the benefits of this measure. If it is the theory of the bill that these appropriations shall stop at the end of eight years, or at furthest at the end of ten years, there is no argument upon which Congress can justify the extension of the bill to the States which have now a more perfect system of education and a less illiteracy than the States which have the greater portion of illiteracy will have at the time when these appropriations will cease.

It seems to me that if we are to extend this aid to all the States, it looks to a system of national education for all time, and I fear that such will be the case.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I shall vote for the amendment because it is in accordance with my views as expressed in the few remarks that I made on the bill at an early stage in the debate.

While I am on my feet I desire to say that on the 23d of last month I proposed certain amendments in order to have them printed, and in explanation of the reason why I do not offer them I will state that the amendment proposed by me, as I explained heretofore, was for the purpose of providing some supervision on the part of the General Government in the distribution of this fund. That having already been provided for in a more economical manner and probably just as effectively by conferring the right of supervision upon the Secretary of the Interior by the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON], I shall not offer the amendment which I proposed and which was printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. PLATT. Let us have the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

Mr. PLUMB (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 11, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—11.

So the amendment was rejected,

Mr. BUTLER. Now that the amendments of the Republican caucus have been voted upon, I shall ask the privilege of introducing an amendment which I offered a day or two ago, but I expect——

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator whether he has secured the consent of his colleagues on that side to his amendment?

Mr. BUTLER. That was not at all necessary. I am not like my friend from Indiana, who has to secure the consent of a caucus before he can offer an amendment. I expect my amendment will have the fate of the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], as his amendment does not appear to have been through the crucible of a caucus. But I wish to see if our friends who are advocating the bill are willing to run their hands into the pockets of their constituencies and see if they will take out the money to pay this sum. ["No!" "No!"] Well, I want to test it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina proposes an amendment, which will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add as an additional section the following:

SEC. —. That the money to be provided for in this act shall be raised by a direct tax to be levied annually upon each of the States of the United States, which shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment just reported.

Mr. BUTLER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to inquire of the Chair, as a matter of order, if that amendment is in order under the Constitution? It is a provision for a direct tax, and can such a measure be originated in the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is a constitutional question, not a parliamentary one. The Chair thinks the amendment is in order as a parliamentary question. If the Chair were obliged to hold as a point of order that all unconstitutional provisions should be rejected by the Chair, the Chair might find himself much occupied.

Mr. HOAR. The Chair will pardon me. I desire to say that in all legislative bodies in this country, including this Congress, unless I am very much mistaken in my recollection, the constitutional right to originate a measure is ruled upon by the presiding officer as a question of order. I have heard it done several times in the House of Representatives. It is a question of order. It may be the Chair is quite right in ruling that he has no right to deal with it.

Mr. BUTLER. This is an appropriation bill originating in the Senate. The Senate has voted for it so far——

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me for interrupting him——

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator moves to change a bill which is not a general appropriation bill, although it contains a provision that money shall be appropriated, into a tax bill. That is the effect of this amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. It is an amendment to an appropriation bill.

Mr. HOAR. If the bill went down to the House the Speaker of the House would rule as a question of order as to its reception as a bill from the Senate containing this proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that that may be; that the House of Representatives might refuse to receive a bill which they thought the Senate had no right to originate; but the Chair adheres to its opinion that it is not within the province of the Chair to rule this amendment out of order on the ground that the Chair may think with the Senator from Massachusetts, that it is an unconstitutional provision. That the Senate must decide in voting for or against it.

Mr. HOAR. If the Chair will pardon me, that is a ruling on my question of order. The question which I raised is a question of order, not a constitutional question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to inquire of the Senator from South Carolina whether in his amendment he has adopted the language of the Constitution?

Mr. BUTLER. I have adopted the language of the Constitution. That instrument has been so kicked and cuffed about in this body for the last week or ten days that I do not know whether there is anything left, but I thought I would adopt part of the language of that instrument. I have done so in terms; and I hope the Senate will not find fault with me for adopting the language of the Constitution, if we can not conform to it in our votes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

Mr. PLUMB (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE].

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 6, nays 38; as follows:

YEAS—6.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RANSOM. I beg leave to offer an amendment to the body of the bill. In section 13, line 20, after the word "school district," I move to strike out the words:

And such other information in relation to the use of the school fund and the condition of common-school education as the Secretary of the Interior may require.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. RANSOM. Mr. President, at this late hour I shall detain the Senate but a moment. I hope that the committee, especially its chairman in charge of the bill, will give me attention for a few seconds while I call attention to these words.

In this same section it is provided what shall be a forfeiture of this appropriation, and the words declaring that forfeiture are almost as general as the words which I propose to strike out.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield?

Mr. RANSOM. Certainly I do, sir.

Mr. BLAIR. It is suggested by several Senators, as well as by the Senator from North Carolina, that there is no objection to those words being stricken out. The requirements are very specific and numerous, and perhaps there may be some objection, as the Senator suggests, to those words. I have no objection to their being stricken from the bill.

The question being put on the amendment, there were on a divison—ayes 23, noes 14; no quorum voting.

Mr. PENDLETON. Let the roll be called.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, and others. Give it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule requires, when it appears there is no quorum——

Mr. RANSOM. Let us take another division.

Mr. CONGER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays are demanded by the Senator from Michigan.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

Mr. PLUMB (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 30, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—30.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer the following amendment as an additional section to the bill:

The fund provided in this act shall not be withheld from any State on account of the fact that its constitution forbids the expenditure of the principal sum of any money that may be appropriated by Congress for the purpose of public education.

I will explain that my purpose in offering the amendment is to get around a difficulty which the constitution of Alabama seems to interpose in regard to the Legislature accepting this fund in the form in which the bill tenders it. I will read it:

The principal of all funds arising from the sale or other disposition of lands or other property which has been or may hereafter be granted or intrusted to this State, or given by the United States for educational purposes, shall be preserved inviolate and undiminished, and the income arising therefrom shall be faithfully applied to the specific objects of the original grants or appropriations.

I desire to protect the State of Alabama from any possible construction of this act by the officers of the United States Government upon which they would be induced to withhold the fund because they might suppose that under the constitutional provision Alabama would have no right to receive this and apply it to the purposes of education. Our Constitution requires that the principal sum of all moneys appropriated by the United States or of property received from the United States or the proceeds of the sales of all property received from the United States shall be set apart as a permanent fund and that the interest alone upon the fund shall be applied to the purpose of education.

This safeguard was put in the constitution of the State in order to prevent the Legislature from making any waste of funds arising from property donated by the Government of the United States for the purposes of education, in order, in other words, to get our State out of the trouble into which Florida seems to have fallen, which had 82,000 or 98,000 acres, I forget which, of public lands donated by an act of Congress, and a constitutional ordinance for the establishment of a university in that State, and nobody has ever yet heard of a Florida university. The lands are all gone or the scrip, or whatever it was, and the whole subject perished and the university is not there. Our State, when we got possession of the government recently, ordained in its last constitution that whatever of funds had arisen or might thereafter arise by donations from the Government of the United States, or by the sale of public lands or other property by appropriations from the Government of the United States in favor of education in our State, should be put into a permanent fund and should not be touched by the Legislature except for the purpose of education, and that only the interest of it or the proceeds of it should be so applied. This may stand in the way.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Does the Senator as a lawyer think that that clause would prevent the use of this money for school purposes as described in this act?

Mr. MORGAN. I think so, because the word "appropriation" is in it. If it was simply the proceeds of the sales of land donated to us, perhaps it would not; but the word "appropriation" is in this constitution. But my point is to prevent any officer of this Government from making the point upon Alabama that she is not entitled because of this provision of her constitution to receive it. It is a precautionary measure. It may not be necessary, but still it is an expression of the opinion of Congress.

Mr. MILLER, of California. This is appro priated not as a permanent school fund, but as a temporary aid to carry on common schools.

Mr. MORGAN. But these lands were not appropriated to establish a permanent school fund. We were not required to sell them or keep them. We had perfect authority to do as we thought proper, and so we applied them to schools.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask the Senator if that provision does not apply to appropriations made to the State of Alabama?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, and this appropriation is one made to the State of Alabama.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; it is an appropriation to all the States together, an appropriation of so much money for school purposes for all the children of the United States. A portion of it is to be set apart for a certain purpose, to be used for the children of Alabama; but it is not an appropriation to the State of Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. Nevertheless if there is a constitutional provision in any State that it should not receive any money from the Government of the United States, I presume you would have to get around that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Allow me to ask a question for information, because I shall be governed by the Senator's opinion in this matter very much. I understand this to be a distribution among the States for a specific purpose. That purpose is to aid in the establishment of common schools. Now, does the Senator think the provisions of the constitution of the State of Alabama refer to general appropriation of public moneys to the States or to appropriations on the condition prescribed in this bill? His opinion as a lawyer—for I have great confidence in it—may control my vote.

Mr. MORGAN. There never has been a general appropriation in the United States of land or money for educational purposes, except you might except the agricultural-scrip grant, which required that the Legislature should first receive by an act of the Legislature the donation from Congress before it could be effective.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Alabama has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. CALL. I do not propose to detain the Senate now, but only to say that the Senator from Alabama is mistaken in the reference he made to Florida. The lands appropriated formerly for a university there were in part divided between the seminaries of Florida, and they are doing very well upon that foundation. A portion of the lands were sold and the money invested in State bonds, and subsequent to the war, under a decree of the United States court, they were very improperly sold as part of the assets of a railroad corporation. I will not go further into that matter at present.

Mr. PUGH. I differ with my colleague as to the construction he places on the constitutional provision. I have no doubt that it applies to unconditional gifts or grants, and has no application whatever to this appropriation, and that is required to be expended annually by the States as one of the conditions of the appropriation. But I do not see that this amendment of his as an additional section can do any harm. It merely provides that it shall not be an objection to a State receiving its share of this appropriation that it has such a provision in its constitution as my colleague has read. It is perfectly harmless, but I differ with him as to the construction of that clause in our constitution.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to ask the Senator if he thinks Congress can amend the constitution of a State?

Mr. PUGH. Oh, no.

Mr. LOGAN. Then what validity will there be in this amendment if we adopt it? No amendment we make here can affect it in the slightest degree.

Mr. PUGH. I do not think it would have any legal effect whatever.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that when the bill came up for consideration the Committee on Education and Labor reported one amendment to take the place of the original text. It was agreed by unanimous consent that that amendment should be treated as the text of the bill and open to amendment. The Chair is in doubt now whether there is more than one amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole, or whether the original amendment of the committee having been agreed to be treated as the text, all the amendments made to that are to be considered now open. The Chair is inclined to think that as the amendment has been made the text, the question now is on agreeing to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole. Shall the question be taken on the entire amendment together or on its various clauses separately? ["All together!"]

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to have a separate vote upon the amendment I offered on page 10, section 14, line 9.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment was disagreed to and is not now before the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I will offer it in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. MORGAN. I now renew in the Senate the same amendment I offered a while ago in Committee of the Whole. Beginning on line 8 of section 14, I move to strike out:

> And each State and Territory from which such apportionment shall be withheld shall have the right to appeal from such decision of the Secretary of the Interior to Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. It is a matter of impossibility that the Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of the Treasury or any other officer of this Government can make a final and conclusive decision against a State in relation to a matter of this kind, or indeed any matter that Congress can not rectify by its legislative action. There is no occasion for putting in here the words that an appeal shall be taken, and certainly we have no power as a Congress to give a right to a State to take an appeal from a decision made by an inferior officer of this Government.

When the States come here they do not come on appeal. It is no judicial tribunal that they come to on appeal. It is mere legislative action that they invoke. Suppose that this is stricken out; should I not have a right as a Senator from Alabama in the event that her allowance of money under this bill had been refused to her by the Secretary of the Interior to offer here a bill or joint resolution revoking his action or correcting it?

By putting these words into this bill we simply signify that we suppose the States of this country, because they receive some largess or donation from Congress upon certain conditions, put themselves in an attitude that they must appeal or have the right derived from Congress to appeal from the decision of the Secretary of the Interior or of the Treasury, as the case may be, to this tribunal. I think that the Senate, on looking the subject over and finding that there is so little confidence in it, will hardly commit themselves deliberately to that enunciation of doctrine; but I want still to see whether they will do it or not.

Mr. HAWLEY. I hope that clause will be stricken out. I do not comprehend the reasons for keeping it in. The State can come here whether it is in or out of the bill, saying that notwithstanding the technical irregularities of the report of the governor the allowance should be made to the State; and if that be not so, I should like to see the form of the writ of error which the State would bring from the decision of the Secretary of the Interior to Congress.

Mr. HARRISON. I suppose that word "appeal" there is not used in the technical sense at all. It is a good deal as the Senator from Connecticut said. It simply means that the State may come to Congress. We all know a State may come without any affirmative expression of that kind in the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. Then I would not put that condition in there.

Mr. HOAR. It is to show that it is not intended that the Secretary of the Interior shall be a final judge, that is all.

Mr. HAWLEY. He is not anyhow, and he can not be against a bill offered by any Senator.

Mr. HOAR. We do not wish to have it claimed "We refer to this officer the decision of all these questions, and you are concluded whether right or wrong; Congress will not trouble itself with it." The clause is intended simply to show that Congress reserves the right to act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HOAR. Let the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is to strike out the words which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 14, line 7, after the word "forfeiture," it is proposed to strike out:

> And each State and Territory from which such apportionment shall be withheld shall have the right to appeal from such decision of the Secretary of the Interior to Congress.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LOGAN. I offer the following amendment as an additional section to the bill:

> SEC. —. That there shall also be appropriated and set apart the sum of $2,000,000, which shall be allotted to the several States and Territories on the same basis as the moneys appropriated in the first section, which shall be known as the common-school-house fund, from which there shall be paid out annually to each State and Territory at the end of the year, until said sum of $2,000,000 shall be exhausted, and no longer; which shall be expended for the erection and construction of school-houses for the use and occupation of the pupils attending the common schools in the sparsely populated districts thereof where the local communities shall be comparatively unable to bear the burdens of taxation. Such school-houses shall be built in accordance with modern plans, which plans shall be furnished free on application to the Bureau of Education, Washington: Provided, however, That not more than $100 shall be paid from said fund toward the cost of any single school-house, nor more than one-half the cost thereof in any case; and the States and Territories shall annually make full report of all expenditures from the school-house fund to the Secretary of the Interior, as in case of other moneys received under the provisions of this act.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I would ask the Senator from Illinois to whom will these school-houses belong after they are built?

Mr. LOGAN. They will belong to the States, as a matter of course, or the township or district or proper authority of the State.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Does this provide for the purchase of sites?

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; it does not provide for the purchase of any site, for the reason that that is unnecessary. The people of the district building the school-house will receive so much money to aid them for this purpose, the same as the aid to the schools.

Mr. CONGER. Are these houses to be built according to plans?

Mr. LOGAN. According to plans furnished by the Bureau of Education in Washington.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN].

Mr. LOGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNA (when Mr. CAMDEN's name was called). My colleague [Mr. CAMDEN] is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

Mr. PLUMB (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BECK. I am not voting on any of these amendments because of the pair I have had with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] who is absent.

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—16.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent to move an amendment in an amendment which has already been adopted on my motion, which I thought had been included. On the eighth page, eleventh section, in the definition of the term "school district," it reads:

The term "school district" shall include all cities, towns, parishes, and all corporations clothed by law with the power of maintaining common schools.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] says that there are other territorial subdivisions in some of the States, including his own, which are not corporations, which have not the power of suing or being sued. I move to insert after the word "parishes," in the thirteenth line, the words "and other territorial subdivisions."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves to amend section 11, line 13, as follows: After the word "parishes" insert "and other territorial subdivisions."

Mr. HOAR. I will have it read "territorial subdivisions for school purposes."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts modifies his amendment so as to read "and other territorial subdivisions for school purposes." The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RANSOM. I wish to say before I vote on this bill that I have received in common with my colleague—and I speak as well for him as I do for myself—the instructions of the last Legislature of North Carolina that we should vote for a bill of this character. I regret very much that there are provisions in this bill which are repugnant to my judgment and which I think greatly impair its value, but I feel called upon to vote for the bill. It is a bill in my judgment of most beneficent promise to the people of this country. ["Vote!"] I do not intend to make a speech.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senate that according to the understanding debate is not in order, all amendments having been disposed of.

Mr. RANSOM. I do not mean to debate. A great poet once said that it was human to hate those whom we have injured. I think he might have said with more truth that it is human to love those whom we have benefited; and if that sentiment be true, I believe the benignity and beneficence of this measure upon the people from whom I come and upon that section of the Union will have a better effect than anything else could have. I regret, as I said, that there are so many features in the bill which do not command the approval of my judgment; but I shall vote for it, first under the instructions of the Legislature of North Carolina, and second because I think it will do good.

I hope that future Congresses, if it becomes necessary, may remedy the evils; and still more, if it be allowable for me to say so, I do trust that in the course of this bill through Congress it will finally take such shape that the States shall receive this grand donation just as the States of the great West received the donation of the public lands, with full faith and confidence that the States themselves will do right in the use of the donation, and not be embarrassed by conditions which, in the judgment of some of us, perhaps the sensibilities of more of us, impair the value of the measure.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will excuse the Senator from North Carolina for voting for the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. COKE. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSOM. I hope the people of Tennessee will excuse the Senator from Tennessee for voting against the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. The people of Tennessee will take care of that.

Mr. RANSOM rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will address the Chair and not speak until they are recognized.

Mr. RANSOM. The Senator from North Carolina——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina will please suspend. Does the Senator from Texas yield to either Senator?

Mr. COKE. I do not, Mr. President. I simply desire to say that I regret extremely to differ as widely as I do with my friend from North Carolina. During the period that I have been a member of the Senate in my humble judgment no bill has ever been introduced into this body and received its serious consideration fraught with so much evil to the country as this bill now about to pass. Mr. President, I can not hear myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will please be in order. The Chair will remark, as he did to the Senator from North Carolina, that according to the unanimous understanding debate is not in order, but it is in order, as the Chair thinks, under the rules of the Senate. The Chair mentioned the same thing to the Senator from North Carolina. The Senator from Texas is entitled under the rules to proceed.

Mr. COKE. I think, Mr. President, that I see in the future more trouble, more strife, that I see the fomentation of more difficulties between the two races in this country, and especially in the South, to arise from this bill than ever ensued from the reconstruction laws. I think I see a system of extravagance and corruption in the administration of common schools in this country beginning with the passage of this bill if it shall pass, removing as it will the management of these schools ultimately from the supervision of the people of the States to Federal supervision at this capital. I think I see more extravagance and corruption than has ever existed before in the management of a school system. I think I can see in the future great dissatisfaction among the people. I think, look where I will where this law will operate, that I can see only evil and no good.

I hope I may be mistaken if the bill shall pass. I hope that its passage, however, will be arrested in the other House of Congress; that the institutions of the people which have been reserved to their management in the States will by the House be preserved to them, and that the action of this body, if it shall so far forget what I believe to be its constitutional duty as to pass this bill, will pass for naught.

It is useless to look to the Senate any longer. The people must rely upon the House of Representatives if they would be saved the misfortune which in my judgment the passage of this bill will bring upon this country.

I have no more to say, Mr. President. I say this simply to express my utter dissent from the views of the honorable Senator from North Carolina, venturing, however, to express the hope that if the bill does pass I may prove to be mistaken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I hate to take even a moment of time, but I will make just one or two observations.

The extent of illiteracy, so far as the future of the country is concerned, has been greatly exaggerated by the statistics spread before us, as it is quite possible to show mathematically. The total illiteracy of the country according to these tables is 15,128,578. The total of children enrolled in the public and private schools is 10,245,914; that is to say 67.7 per cent. of all the children in the country are enrolled. It has been the habit of those who defend such bills to say that therefore 32.3 per cent. are growing up without the possibility of knowing the English alphabet; but let me show in a single moment the gross mistake this is.

In some States the limit of school age is from 5 to 21; that is to say, the school life is sixteen years. It is obviously possible that the return of those States shall show that only one-half the children are enrolled in the public schools, and yet that every child in each of those States may go to school eight years and acquire a comfortable common-school education. There is where the error comes in in this reasoning. You may take the best system of education you please and you never can find that all the children of school age are enrolled. They come as near it perhaps in my State as any.

The average attendance is probably 10½ years out of the 12; therefore, with 67.7 of the children of the country enrolled, it is yet possible that every child may attend school 9 years and 7 months. The average school time in the country is 14.2 years. Every child, it may be, will attend 9 years and 7 months, and yet the returns show these frightful figures of illiteracy.

I do not deny that with the adult ex-slave population and with a large number of foreigners included in our census there are many adults who can not read or write; but the future of the children of the country was never so bright as it is to-day, and never growing brighter with more rapidity, growing by the very best possible means from the free heart and the generous exertion and self-sacrifice of the people; and the more you relieve them from it the less you strengthen and the more you weaken the public system of the country.

The money that comes from a long distance, that is not felt by the tax-payers, is money easily expended; and that may be said of the whole Federal revenue. Therefore we should be the more jealous as to what we do with it. It is as costly as if we took it by direct taxation right out of their pockets. I believe it has been said here, but if it has not it can be now, that if this money were to be levied by direct taxation this bill would not get ten votes in the Senate.

But I did not intend to make a speech, or even to say so much as this. I wish to close with just four lines from the address of the school superintendent in my State in opposing this general measure:

All experience teaches us that such distributions of public money are wasteful, that they give opportunities for jobbery and corruption, that they kill the very interests which they are planned to promote, and that they end in debauching the people with their own money.

God save that this is not true prophecy in this case.

TERRITORIAL BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. Under instructions of the Committee on Rules, I report the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk, and give notice that after it has been read I shall demand the previous question on its adoption.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Tuesday, April 8, and Tuesday, May 13, immediately after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Territories, not, however, to include any bills for the creation of new Territories or the admission of new States.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] if it is the intention by that resolution to exclude the consideration of bills other than those for the admission of Territories as States? As I heard the resolution read it would appear to exclude even the bill providing a government for the Territory of Alaska, which is an important measure.

Mr. WASHBURN. I ask that the resolution be again read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. RANDALL. I will say to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. EVINS], who is a member of the Committee on Territories, that I think the language of the resolution will exclude the consideration of any bill for the creation of a Territorial government for Alaska. That matter can be reported upon by the Committee on Territories and take its place on the Calendar and be considered in due course.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I hope the House will not agree to the resolution in its present shape. The bill establishing a government for the Territory of Alaska has already passed the Senate and has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Territories of this House. If it is left to take its chance upon the Calendar there is scarcely any possibility that it will be reached in regular order. It is a bill of vital importance to the people who have gone into that Territory, and certainly Congress should not longer hesitate about furnishing those people with some form of government. I simply make this statement to the House for the information of members. I am satisfied if members will reflect upon the matter for a moment they will see the propriety of so modifying this resolution as not to exclude legislation in reference to Alaska.

Mr. RANDALL. This report is made at the instance of the Committee on Territories, and so far as I can learn meets their approval. I understand that that committee does not desire to have any subject brought up for consideration under this resolution which will be likely to give rise to an extended discussion. That is the reason why the limitation was made, in order that the days designated might be devoted to the consideration of matters of importance to the Territories, and at the same time such matters as will not lead to the consumption of all the time allowed in the consideration of but one or two measures. I have no authority to accept any amendment.

Mr. CASSIDY. This resolution contemplates the consideration of only such business as may be reported from the Committee on Territories. I think it is not broad enough. The Delegates from the Territories should have an opportunity to call up and have considered any business relating to their Territories, whether from the Committee on Territories or from any other committee of this House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand the regular order; I understand that the previous question has been demanded on the resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. Under the rule fifteen minutes' debate is allowed on each side.

Mr. HOLMAN. After the previous question has been ordered.

Mr. KASSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] a question. Is it intended to exclude the consideration of any bill making provision for the government of Alaska? If it is, then I would inquire of the gentleman if he would not except Alaska?

Mr. RANDALL. I have already stated that the resolution was drawn to exclude legislation in relation to Alaska.

Mr. HOLMAN. I insist on the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the demand for the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 4993) making it a felony for a person to falsely and fraudulently assume or pretend to be an officer or employé acting under authority of the United States or any Department thereof, and prescribing a penalty therefor.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Wednesday, April 9, 1884, be set apart for the consideration of such bills reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and Senate bills upon the Speaker's table relating to the erection of public buildings as the committee shall designate, and that this special order continue from day to day until all such bills on the House Calendar and the Speaker's table shall have been considered and acted upon by the House, not to interfere with appropriation and revenue bills and special orders heretofore made; and that in the consideration of each bill and its amendments not more than thirty minutes shall be consumed in debate—fifteen minutes on each side.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for a second on the motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint tellers on the demand for a second, and the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. STOCKSLAGER, and the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. HOLMAN, will act as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 153, noes 32.

So there was a second.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule of the House thirty minutes will be allowed for debate, fifteen minutes in support of the resolution and fifteen minutes against it.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Four months of this session have already passed. There have been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of this House thirty bills in relation to public buildings, four of them bills to extend the limitations fixed by previous acts of Congress, leaving twenty-six original bills reported by the committee of this House. These bills are in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. There are upon the Speaker's table twenty-four bills in relation to public buildings which have passed the Senate. This includes eleven bills which are duplicates of bills reported by the House committee.

And I have said, four months of session have elapsed, and I believe we have not in a single instance gone to either of those Calendars, and I think it exceedingly doubtful whether we shall be able to do so at any time during this session. The question, then, for the House to determine now is whether any bills for the erection of public buildings shall be passed by this Congress during this session. If any such bills are to be passed, this or a similar resolution must be adopted fixing a day for the consideration of such business.

I take it that the policy of this House will not be that no public-building bills shall be passed. If that is to be the policy of this House, however, we should know it now; if this House is to pass no measure of this kind, however meritorious, there is no necessity for our committee to go on and perfect bills or for the Senate to send us bills of this character to go upon our Speaker's table.

That is all there is in this resolution. It simply provides that Wednesday, April 9—the day after to-morrow—shall be fixed for the consideration of public-building bills on the House Calendar and upon the Speaker's table, makes this business a continuing order from day to day until disposed of, not to interfere with revenue or appropriation or pension bills or special orders. It also confines debate upon any bill to thirty minutes—fifteen on each side.

Mr. WILLIS. What becomes of the bills not yet reported?

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Those bills which may be reported hereafter will be considered of course as they may be reached upon the Calendar. Without further remarks now I will reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I will answer the gentleman's question if I have the time; I do not want to occupy all my time just now.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I hope the gentleman will at any rate have time to tell us how much money these thirty-seven bills reported from the House committee——

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Not thirty-seven, but thirty.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And twenty-four bills from the Senate call for?

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I will tell the gentleman how much money the House bills call for. Including the increase of the limitations fixed in public-building acts passed heretofore, they propose to authorize the appropriation of $4,643,000. That is the amount—the limit.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will that complete the buildings?

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Yes, sir. Deducting the bills which simply extend the limits of former acts, the total amount appropriated by these House bills is $2,917,000—an average of $112,000 to each bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. What is to be the average cost of these buildings?

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. One hundred and twelve thousand dollars for each is the average. I now reserve the residue of my time.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, there are undoubtedly a number of bills reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds which ought to be passed—bills in favor of which there is a public reason; and I concede that bills of that class ought to be considered, but here is a great mass of bills. I regret very much to antagonize the views of my colleague [Mr. STOCKSLAGER], the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. I had hoped that such of these bills as are really meritorious and the buildings really required in the public service would come before the House from time to time in the regular course and be considered, at least to the extent that the House may deem proper to consider such bills at this session. But this resolution goes to the broadest extent. It not only fixes a day for the consideration of this class of bills, but provides that these bills shall be considered from day to day until disposed of. Now, how many of these bills are there even now? If I correctly counted them, there are thirty-three of these bills on the House Calendar—House bills reported from the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

A MEMBER. Thirty.

Mr. HOLMAN. Thirty; and there is a sufficient number on the Speaker's table from the Senate to swell the aggregate, if I have counted correctly, to fifty-five. Fifty-five bills even now!

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman should remember that some of these bills from the Senate are for the same purpose as bills pending in the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. There may be some Senate bills which are duplicates of House bills.

Mr. CASSIDY. They are all duplicates, as I understand, except ten.

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, the number of these bills reported from the House committee and those upon the Speaker's table count up fifty-five, if my counting is correct. The amount of money involved in these bills, to begin with, is $7,529,000. The amount involved, however, is not of so much importance as a fact to which I wish to call attention—that this is but the beginning. We have reached the month of April; and the amount involved in the bills now before us at this comparatively early period of the session is over $7,000,000. This is the beginning not only as it concerns the session, but the beginning as it concerns the question of expenditures of public money involved in these bills—bills which it is proposed to pass by a general combination of local interests.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is a consideration beyond all that. We have reached the 7th day of April, and we have passed through this House the Post-Office appropriation bill——

Mr. BELFORD. And cut it down $4,000,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Naval appropriation bill——

Mr. BELFORD. And cut it down $8,000,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. The West Point Academy appropriation bill——

Mr. BELFORD. And cut it down three or four million dollars.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Agricultural appropriation bill and the Indian appropriation bill. Thus we have passed in the House only five of the thirteen great appropriation bills which must be passed by both Houses of Congress before we adjourn—eight of the leading appropriation bills yet to be considered.

You have in addition to that a very important measure affecting your revenue pending before this House, the tariff bill, and a series of the most important bills affecting the public lands. Gentlemen talk about an adjournment in June! Have we considered, Mr. Speaker, that the consideration of these great and important public measures which are pressing upon us, questions not only of public importance but public necessity, are to be more or less affected during the time these bills for the erection of public buildings are slowly working their way through the House?

Mr. BELFORD. It will take surplus money out of the vaults of the Treasury.

Mr. HOLMAN. Independently of that, you have entered on the discharge of a public duty I deem as important as any that was ever devolved on Congress, a subject which you have put in the very front rank of your measures to be considered and acted upon at this session, that of reforming your public land laws and determining to what extent grants heretofore made shall be restored to the public domain for the benefit of bona fide settlers and landless people. Those measures, Mr. Speaker, are all to be affected to a greater or less degree, as well as your appropriation bills, your tariff bill, and other important public measures now pending and to be pending, all these are to be affected for the purpose of considering—what? These special and local measures for the erection of public buildings which have not even been recommended to you by the head of a single one of your Departments.

Mr. BELFORD. We do not want any head of Department to recommend them.

Mr. HOLMAN. Buildings not estimated for, as well as not recommended, and touching which this House has no official information whatever.

Mr. BELFORD. They have nothing to do with them.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not covered even by estimates of appropriations in the ordinary course of business.

Mr. YOUNG. Every one of them, I understand, is recommended.

Mr. HOLMAN. None of them are mentioned in your Book of Estimates. Neither of them has been recommended by the Treasury Department, or the Interior Department, Post-Office Department, or any other Department of the Government, so far as I am informed, for none of them appear in the public estimates. Not one of them, sir, so far as I am informed, comes here with the authority of any recommendation from those charged with the administration of your public affairs. And yet, sir, great public measures, some of them of the highest public importance and of the most urgent necessity, will be postponed, while these bills of merely local and personal interest are to consume the time of the House day after day for no one can tell how long a period.

Mr. COX, of New York. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX, of New York. Will the gentleman please state to the House what is the aggregate amount of appropriation made by these bills to which he refers?

Mr. HOLMAN. As I infer by running over the list there are some fifty-five, and the amount involved in the first instance is something over $7,500,000 to begin with.

Mr. BELFORD. And there is a surplus of $150,000,000 in the Treasury which ought not to be allowed to stay there.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Let me make a correction.

Mr. BELFORD. That is a magnificent exhibition of Democratic generosity.

Mr. COX, of New York. I do not see why these bills should not take their chance with other bills.

Mr. HOLMAN. My colleague [Mr. STOCKSLAGER] has time of his own, and I hope he will let me say, in addition to what I have already said, without interruption, that under the rule allowing suspension of the rules and half an hour of debate on each proposition the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds can secure the passage of all of this class of bills which are entitled to special consideration and all that are necessary for any public purpose. I have suggested that some ten or fifteen of these bills, the most meritorious, be selected by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and let the House consider them in a body if you think proper; but do not take up the time of the House to the exclusion of other business for the consideration of this long list of bills, some of which are of public importance, and many of merely private and local concern and for comparatively unimportant localities. To devote days of the precious time of this session of Congress to the consideration of such special matters not recommended by any Department seems to me to be utterly unjustifiable in the present condition of the public business.

Mr. BELFORD. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HOLMAN. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. Eight minutes of the gentleman's time remain.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will yield three minutes of that time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. WARNER rose.

Mr. LOWRY. Before the gentleman proceeds I should like to ask my colleague a question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. LOWRY. I understood my colleague to say that not one of these bills was recommended by any of the public functionaries connected with the various Departments of this Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. I said so far as I am informed.

Mr. LOWRY. I desire to state most respectfully for the information of my colleague that the Supervising Architect of the Treasury has recommended one of these bills.

Mr. HOLMAN. For an increase or for an original structure?

Mr. LOWRY. For an increase.

Mr. HOLMAN. I spoke, as the gentleman will recollect, of original propositions.

Mr. MILLS. I know of one he recommends for an original building.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have not heard of a single such instance. There are no such estimates.

Mr. LOWRY. I beg leave to state that the case I refer to has been recommended.

Mr. HOLMAN. I take it for granted that as to the public building in my friend's district there has been a recommendation for the extension of the building and for increase of the appropriation. I am glad to make this correction, but this is not an original work.

Mr. LOWRY. It was recommended not only by the present Supervising Architect of the Treasury, but it was concurred in by the former Supervising Architect and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am glad to make the correction.

A list of the bills is as follows:

NOTE.—Those marked with a * are increases over former appropriations, in the case of H. R. 1339 the limit of cost being increased to $1,500,000.

I will now yield for three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It does seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that this proposition to displace all of the public business before this House and give preference to a number of bills for the erection of public buildings throughout the country—matters of mere local interest only—is entirely unwarranted and should not be adopted. I quite agree with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] in that respect. Not only that, sir, but I am informed that there are not less perhaps than three hundred bills of this character. I may be misinformed as to the number, but that there are probably not less than three hundred bills calling for the erection of public buildings which have been introduced and sent to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds up to this date.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. My friend from Ohio is largely in excess of the number.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Such is my information.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I venture to assert that the number will not reach one hundred.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Well, even one hundred is a very large number to be considered by the committee. But, sir, these buildings will probably cost, or rather an appropriation, if appropriated for at all, will be made of from one hundred to one hundred and fifty thousand dollars for each, and before we are through with them that expenditure will average perhaps $200,000. Mr. Speaker, until we can change the entire plan of constructing public buildings, until we can bring their cost down to something near at least the cost of buildings which the people can afford to erect for themselves in these various localities, I am opposed to the whole system. This method of appropriating $150,000 for the erection of a public building in a town where there is not a single structure erected by the people that has cost as much as $25,000 or $30,000 or from that to $50,000 is all wrong; and yet that is the plan upon which the Government has proceeded in the construction of its buildings all over the country. Where the expenditure may be limited within reasonable bounds; where it might be justifiable in certain cases to appropriate $20,000 for a public building or $15,000 or even $10,000, which would construct a building quite as good as other buildings in such localities, it is the practice to appropriate $100,000, $150,000, or $200,000.

Mr. TULLY. And where the Government does not pay $500 a year rent.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Yes, sir; it is far more economical in most cases for the Government to pay the rent than to put up the building. Besides that, especially in political years, these structures will involve largely increased expense for care and repairs. These buildings, if erected, will require under such circumstances to be painted two or three times a year; it will cost more to take care of them, to furnish them, to keep them up, than it would to rent such buildings as the Government actually requires. And now for such purposes to lay aside, to push over all the public business before the House in order to give preference to this class of bills is in my judgment a mistake and altogether inadmissible and wrong.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield now two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] if he desires it.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I only desire to say a word, and that is this: Fairness to the other committees of this House and to the gentlemen charged by its authority with other matters demands that every bill should take its chances before the House fairly and equally, and that no preference should be given to any committee over the others. I do not believe it is right to give a special privilege to this one committee. In a bill so arranged that if one goes through all of these buildings will go through, it is especially wrong to do so. It is the old game. I can not possibly designate it by its proper title, for I was once called to order in this House for calling it "log-rolling." But that kind of legislation is bad. It can not be justified. Let each building, either for increase or otherwise, be allowed to stand on its own foundation.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. It will do that anyhow.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not desire to prolong the debate——

Mr. YOUNG. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. YOUNG. I wish to ask how long gentlemen opposing this measure will have the right to speak in this way.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule of the House fifteen minutes are allowed in support of, and fifteen in opposition to, the proposition.

Mr. YOUNG. The gentleman has already exceeded that limit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. YOUNG. If I am not mistaken, my watch indicates that they have already passed beyond that period.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that two minutes yet remain in opposition.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask my colleague from Indiana, the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, how many other bills are pending before that committee for the construction of public buildings.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I am not able to give the exact number, but there are several.

Mr. HOLMAN. But there are quite a number, as I understand, still unacted upon.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Yes, sir. Each one, however, of course will depend upon its own individual merits.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee has one minute.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, in that one minute I propose to say that by this resolution not only will the opportunity be given for the increase of the already large number of these domed and turreted mausoleums of expiring liberty, but it will be done by a process never before inaugurated in this House. This embraces more than fifty bills, which will cost from five to ten millions dollars. I hope this House will not enter upon such a wild career in the erection of public buildings as the last Congress did. Where buildings are needed, let them be built. But where they are not, let us not bind ourselves here to a consideration of Senate bills without ever referring them to a committee of the House. It is proposed that that list of bills, about fifty in number, shall be put through here in violation of all the rules of the House.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. The number is thirty-nine.

Mr. MCMILLIN. But you say there are others from the Senate which will take the same course.

Mr. YOUNG. I rise to a question of order. Has not the time for the opposition to the resolution expired?

The SPEAKER. It has not. Fifteen minutes are allowed in support of the resolution and fifteen minutes in opposition to it. Only one minute remains of the time allowed in opposition to the resolution, which is now being occupied by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN].

Mr. MCMILLIN. It is proposed to pass the Senate bills without referring them to any committee of the House, in violation of the rules, with a debate on these bills each involving from $50,000 to $1,500,000 of only fifteen minutes on a side. There are good bills among them, but we should have an opportunity to separate the wheat from the chaff.

The SPEAKER. The time for debate in opposition to the resolution has expired.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD].

Mr. BELFORD. I recollect that during the last session of Congress the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] stood up here in the face of this House and asked that the salaries of members of Congress should be reduced.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I was judging by what some of them deserved.

Mr. BELFORD. Hold on; I have but three minutes. I say that a man of brains who is fit to be here can secure from his earnings in his profession every year from $10,000 to $20,000. The gentleman from Tennessee is a fit companion for the gentleman from Indiana, who objects to this bill because it takes out of the national Treasury the enormous sum of $7,000,000. They should be braced together like the love birds of Africa and sweetly float through the air with the feathers of the one touching the feathers of the other forever and forever. [Laughter.]

I say that this Government, having a vast surplus revenue in the Treasury, should secure for itself a home in every important place in this country where it transacts judicial business. I challenge the gentleman from Indiana to deny that proposition. Why should not our nation have a home everywhere where it has a national court-house? Let demagogy go to the devil. [Laughter.] Let us act like men of sense and judgment and discretion. My time is out. [Laughter.]

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT].

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I shall support this resolution for the reason that I see no other way to reach these bills on the Calendar. Gentlemen have been taking very exaggerated views of it. The bills amount to $4,000,000. It is assumed that there is implied an appropriation of $4,000,000 during the fiscal year out of the Treasury. That is untrue, sir. The bills simply provide that the buildings may be constructed, leaving the sum of money to be devoted to the purpose entirely within the hands of any future Congress.

I remember, sir, when I first came to the consideration of appropriations for public buildings I found the building at Cincinnati, the one at Chicago, the one at New York, &c., some of them involving from two to eight and ten millions of dollars. But the large expenditures which alarmed the country in reference to the great public buildings have passed away. These bills involve expenditures ranging from $50,000 to $100,000, and this long list that is paraded here to frighten members away from a fair consideration of these bills all put together do not equal the cost of the building at Cincinnati, or Chicago, or New York, or Philadelphia.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. There was $800,000 appropriated for New York last year.

Mr. BLOUNT. I say this is all a bugbear—the parading of this list as to the number of public buildings. The number is great, but the sum of money that can be appropriated at any time is small. If we appropriate the whole of it now in this Congress it would not amount to more than $4,000,000, and the practice of Congress is to appropriate not the whole sum, but from 25 to 30 per cent of the amount; so that if the usages of this House be followed, instead of these bills authorizing an expenditure of $4,000,000, the amount will not be more than a million and a half at the next session and nothing at this.

I trust that we shall not hesitate to fix a day for the consideration of these bills. When the day shall have been fixed it is perfectly competent for the House to examine them bill by bill, and to determine as to each particular building whether or not you shall agree it shall be constructed at all. The bills do not carry a dollar even if you pass them. The whole matter of expenditure is in your hands afterward.

I know, sir, that there is some fear that possibly bills may pass that ought not to pass. But I am aware that the policy of the country has been for years to construct these buildings. The majority of the House is anxious to consider the bills, and the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds tells us there is no way in which they are likely to be reached except the way which the committee recommends. Although the bills may not be all that I desire, I propose for one to give my vote for their consideration, reserving the right to pass upon the rights of each individual measure hereafter.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN].

Mr. MILLIKEN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] has stated the question aright. The object of the resolution is simply to give these bills consideration. The House is not obliged to appropriate money for any one of these buildings unless it finds it meritorious. Now, is the House afraid of itself? Is it afraid to take these bills into consideration? We simply want to have them considered.

The gentleman from Ohio thinks it would be cheaper to rent buildings. I would say to the gentleman it would be cheaper for him to die than to live. He can buy a coffin for five dollars, while he can not live very long for that.

In the capital city of my own State there are between eighteen and nineteen million pieces of mail matter handled annually in two old buildings three hundred feet apart, with no vaults and with no protection at all against fire for the property of the Government.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has two minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. In that two minutes I desire to say simply that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of this House have very carefully examined these bills. As I stated in the outset, the average amount covered by each bill is about $110,000. There are just thirty-nine bills altogether, including both House and Senate bills. The House bills, including those which provide for extending the limitations imposed by previous acts, cover the amount of $4,643,000; excluding those bills, the appropriations covered by them will amount to $2,917,000.

Of the twenty-four bills from the Senate which are upon the Speaker's table eleven are duplicates of those which have been reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of this House, leaving only thirteen Senate bills not included among those reported by the House Committee. That makes a total of thirty-nine bills, carrying somewhere between four and five millions of dollars, if all the bills shall become laws and the whole amount named in them shall be appropriated.

As I have before said, all that the committee ask is that these bills shall have a hearing. I think it is due to the committee, it is due to the people of this country so largely interested in these matters, that there shall be some time set apart for the consideration of these bills.

The SPEAKER. The time allowed by the rule for debate has expired. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STOCKSLAGER] to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution which has been read.

Mr. COSGROVE. I ask that the resolution be again read.

The SPEAKER. It has been twice read; but if objection is not made it will again be read.

Mr. MILLS. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOLMAN. After a resolution has been debated, can it not be read again as a matter of right on the part of those members who have not been able to fully catch its meaning?

The SPEAKER. Every member on the floor has a right to demand that a resolution shall be once read; that is a matter of right. This resolution has been read twice, perhaps three times. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COSGROVE] asked to have it read again, and objection was made.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust no objection will be made to its being read again.

Mr. MILLS. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The question is upon agreeing to the motion to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, and Mr. BEACH called for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and there were 54 in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. There having been no vote taken to-day, the Chair will count the other side.

The negative vote was then taken.

The SPEAKER. Upon ordering the yeas and nays there are 53 in the affirmative and 93 in the negative. More than one-fifth voting in favor of ordering the yeas and nays, they are ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 162, nays 77, not voting 83; as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

TARIFF ON WOOL.

Mr. CONVERSE. I move to suspend the rules so as to discharge the Committee on Ways and Means from the further consideration of the bill which I send to the desk and pass the same.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1218) to restore the rates of duty on imported wool.

Be it enacted, &c., That the rates of duty to be levied, collected, and paid upon the three several classes of wool and hair from the alpaca, goat, and other like animals, as now classified by law, which may be imported from foreign countries, shall be restored and fixed at what they were on each of the three classes, respectively, of said articles at the time of the passage of the act of March 3, 1883, entitled "An act to reduce internal-revenue taxation, and for other purposes," any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. MORRISON. I demand a second on this motion.

Mr. MCKINLEY. For the purpose of saving time, I suggest that a second be considered as ordered by unanimous consent.

Mr. MORRISON. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the motion will be considered as seconded. The Chair hears none. The question is now upon agreeing to the motion. Under the rules thirty minutes are allowed for debate—fifteen minutes in favor of the motion and fifteen minutes against it.

Mr. CONVERSE. I yield four minutes to my colleague [Mr. MCKINLEY].

Mr. MCKINLEY. Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes which by the courtesy of my colleague I am permitted to occupy I will have little time to more than express my hearty approval of the bill now under consideration and my earnest desire that it may be enacted into law.

The general revision of the tariff made by the last Congress reduced the duties on wool to 10 cents and 12 cents per pound on first and second class wools. That is, it abolished the 10 and 11 per cent. ad valorem which under the act of 1867 were assessed on these two classes of wool in addition to the specific duty of 10 and 12 cents per pound.

The bill now before us proposes to restore the ad valorem rates, so that hereafter the duties to be levied and collected upon these two grades of wool shall be 10 cents per pound and 11 per cent. ad valorem upon one class, and 12 cents per pound and 10 per cent. ad valorem upon the other. In a word, it restores the duties upon wool as fixed by the act of 1867. It is only proper that I should state that the last House never had an opportunity to vote upon the wool duty as a separate proposition, but was compelled to vote upon the Senate bill as agreed to in the conference committee as a whole. The alternative was then presented to the House of passing the bill as an entirety, which involved reductions in custom rates and large reductions of internal-revenue taxes amounting to $40,000,000 annually, or defeat it, and thus lose everything of good which the bill contained. Had the question of disturbing the wool duty been presented distinct and separate, the reduction would never have taken place. This was shown when the Ways and Means Committee authorized one of its members to offer as a committee amendment the wool duties of 1867, which would have been presented and passed had the consideration of this schedule ever been reached in the House. Nor would the conference committee have failed to correct the wrong if it had not been made manifest by repeated votes in the Senate that the increase proposed upon wool would certainly have defeated the bill in the Senate.

The reduction was made under the circumstances I have named, and the injustice of it has come to be recognized by the Republican party and by many Democrats in Ohio and other States. We now have an opportunity to do justice to this important article of American production, and the proposition of my colleague, plain and simple, is to correct the injustice, and place the wool industry of the country where the legislation of last winter found it.

The act of 1867, which this bill proposes to restore, was in every sense a just one, equitable in its provisions, and time has demonstrated its practical benefits in the growth and development of wool production. In 1850 there were 21,723,220 sheep in the United States, producing 52,516,959 pounds of wool; in 1860 there were 22,471,225 sheep, producing 60,264,913 pounds; in 1870 there were 28,477,951 sheep, producing 100,102,387 pounds; in 1880 there were 43,576,899 sheep, producing 235,648,834 pounds; in 1883, 50,500,000 sheep, producing 320,000,000 pounds of wool.

From 1860 to 1870, during the decade when the protective-tariff act of 1867 went into operation, the number of sheep increased 25 per cent., while in the decade between 1850 and 1860 it was less than 4 per cent., while the price of wool has decreased to the consumer, amply demonstrating that adequate protection does not increase the cost of the protected article.

There are more than a million of our fellow-citizens directly interested in this form of production. They constitute the farmers of the country, great and small. They feel that a great wrong has been done them; that the value of their product has been most seriously diminished, and that unless Congress gives them the needed relief their business will be further seriously crippled and eventually destroyed; that sheep-husbandry in the older States will be a thing of the past, and the production of the finer grades of wool which enter so largely into domestic manufacture will be exclusively the product of Australia and other foreign countries, which can result only to the injury of our own people; for when Australia once gets control of this market she will increase the price to the manufacturer and consumer. In every aspect, therefore, and for every interest in the United States this bill ought to pass.

The farmers, busy with their own employments, do not often come to this legislative body asking for legislative relief, and when they do come their requests should receive the highest consideration, and when just and reasonable, as in this case, they should command prompt and favorable action.

Petitions from all of the wool-growing States, extending from Vermont to California, have poured in upon this House almost daily from the opening of the session, urging the prompt restoration of the wool duty of 1867. It is not Ohio alone, but every State in the Union is concerned in your favorable action upon this bill. Their appeals should not go unheeded. I do not doubt that every member on this side, as a simple act of justice, will vote for this measure. It is in harmony with the principle of protection which we advocate as a party and the policy which we have always pursued. There should be no halting in response to their request. I earnestly appeal to you to vote for this bill, and with the aid of gentlemen on the other side we may to-day, so far as this branch of the legislative will can do it, right this wrong.

This motion requires a two-thirds vote; so with the entire vote of this side of the House we must have a large vote from the other side to succeed. May I appeal to the Democrats of this House to aid generously by their votes in this much-needed legislation? I venture to do it the more boldly because your brethren last fall in Ohio, by platform, public speech, and campaign literature, assured the people in the most authoritative manner that the wool duty of 1867 should be restored at the beginning of this Congress. It was not the campaign clatter of irresponsible politicians, it was the voice and the utterances of the leaders of the party in the State supported by the leaders of the party in other States.

Mr. DUNN. Who are they?

Mr. MCKINLEY. Why, the whole Democratic party. I hold in my hand a pamphlet issued by the authority of the Ohio State central Democratic committee, in which they said if Mr. Hoadly was elected governor of Ohio that this Congress, which fortunately was Democratic (as they declared), on the very first days of its session should wipe out the iniquity inflicted on the wool-growers by the Republicans of the last Congress. The people heard and believed these party assurances, and thousands of wool-growers who had always theretofore voted otherwise voted the Democratic ticket, transferred the entire political power of the State from the control of the Republican to that of the Democratic party, captured the executive and both branches of the Legislature, and elected a United States Senator. And now that you have gathered the fruit of their faith and your promises, the farmers and wool-growers of the State demand and have a right to demand that you make good your pledges and keep faith with those who acted upon your assurances. You have secured the prize of victory—party success—now step up and keep your promises. [Applause on the Republican side of the House.] Do I make this too strong? Let me read you what your party said last September, and you will say that if they were dealing fair and honorably with the people then, they have a right to expect the prompt passage of the bill:

I read from a pamphlet issued by the Democratic executive committee of Ohio and sent broadcast over the State in the campaign of last fall:

The Democrats propose to work industriously for power, with full confidence in the intelligence of the people, and when they obtain power to at once repeal the iniquitous measure (the wool tariff).

Is it possible to obtain a restoration of the duty entire?

This is the question which every sheep-owner in Ohio is asking himself. We say to every farmer, and with all possible emphasis, that the question must be answered now.

Next year will not do. The reason is clear; the issue has been raised in the present Ohio campaign, and the wool interest elsewhere, as well as the enemies of the wool interest, are unanimous in recognizing that the result of the Ohio campaign will decide whether the duty shall be restored immediately or whether its restoration shall be left to the chances of the future.

The election of Hoadly, on the other hand, means the triumph of the Democrats and the success of their objects, of which the unconditional restoration of the duty on wool entire is one of the most important. This triumph will create a most irresistible sentiment throughout the nation in favor of the wool-growers, and when Congress meets next winter (it is, fortunately, Democratic in the House) the strength of public opinion will be so great that the President will not dare resist it, and he will readily sign any measure brought forward for relief. The consequence will be that farmers will be able to retain their flocks and go on with the profitable production of wool. The election of a Democratic Legislature insures the election of a Democratic United States Senator from Ohio and largely increases the chances of having a Democratic majority in the United States Senate, and in that event the Democratic party will be in a situation to redeem its promise made to the wool-growers of Ohio in its State platform. Farmers of Ohio, can you trust the party that has in our national Legislature outraged and robbed you at the bidding of the capitalists of New England? Is there any hope for you from such a party, who have thus deliberately sacrificed your dearest and best interest? The party that created this great wrong can not be trusted to give you relief. The Democrats in Congress were your friends. They sought by every means in their power to prevent this wrong from being inflicted on you. Trust the Democratic party in this matter; it has promised to and will give you relief.

Will you ignore these promises, so authoritatively made, and deny the great farming class this much-needed legislation?

I am earnestly and heartily for this bill and sincerely hope the House will give it the requisite number of votes to insure its adoption, and thus demonstrate its purpose to carefully guard and protect the American wool raised by the American farmer against the foreign competitor whose product is prepared for the market by a cheap labor—so cheap and illy paid that no farmer in the United States can or will enter with it the field of competition. Our farmers who have contributed so largely to the wealth and progress of this nation are justly entitled to the relief they ask.

Mr. CONVERSE. I now yield to the gentleman from California for two minutes.

Mr. COX, of New York. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX, of New York. My point of order, Mr. Speaker, is this: The gentleman from Ohio has asked permission to print certain things which was not given by the House; that is, to print certain expressions used in the Ohio campaign last year.

Mr. MCKINLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX, of New York. Let me ask the gentleman if he includes me in the list?

Mr. MCKINLEY. No; I do not.

Mr. COX, of New York. I wish to correct a story that has been going the round on that subject.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I understood the gentleman from New York while he spoke in Ohio last fall for the Democratic party did not get on the platform of protection adopted by the Democratic party of that State. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. COX, of New York. You are right. I do not object to granting permission to the gentleman to print.

The extent of this interest will be observed from the following statistics:

Mr. CONVERSE. I yield now two minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HENLEY].

Mr. HENLEY. I can not do much, Mr. Speaker, in this debate inside of two minutes; but as a contribution from one of the largest wool-producing States in this Union I desire to say that the present tariff is regarded in the locality where I come from as being unjustly discriminative in favor of the manufacturer and against the wool farmer, and as a measure of justice to the farmer the tariff of 1867 should be restored upon wool.

Mr. CONVERSE. I now yield two minutes to my colleague from Ohio [Mr. WILKINS].

Mr. WILKINS addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. CONVERSE. I reserve the balance of my time until I hear from the other side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has eight minutes remaining.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, it will be remembered that the Tariff Commission, at the end of its eighth months' exercises, fixed the duty on wool as it is in the law to-day. Their report was approved by the gentlemen on the other side of the House and their protective friends, few in number, on this; approved in the Senate, went to a committee of conference, and finally became a law. Professedly these gentlemen would undo their work and restore the duty to the rate where they found it. What estimate is to be made of their professions the country will rightly determine. Whatever may be the views of gentlemen upon the question of protective bounties, the duty on wool cannot justly or rightly be considered apart from the duty upon woolen goods into which the wool extends and makes up a very large part of the cost of manufactured woolen goods.

A bill has been reported to the House on the general subject of the tariff, embracing the rates of duty on both wool and woolen goods, and I shall ask the House on Tuesday of next week to take up that bill and consider it, and with it this question of the tax or duty on wool and woolen goods, together with the other questions of taxation which that bill presents.

I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD], since it is claimed to be in some way an Ohio question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has thirteen minutes remaining.

Mr. HURD. Mr. Speaker, I oppose this motion, because it proposes to restore the duty on wool and thereby increase the price of that commodity. It does this directly by increasing the price of foreign wool required in domestic manufacturing. The question thus plainly presented is, ought the price of wool to be increased by legislation?

There are three classes interested in the answer to this question—first, those who consume articles made of wool; secondly, those who manufacture woolen goods; and, thirdly, those who produce the raw material itself.

The manifest effect upon the first class—the consumer—is to increase the price of his woolen goods, for you can not add to the price of the raw material of which the article is made without increasing the price of the article itself. Ought, then, to the consumers of this country the price of woolen goods be increased? To this question, Mr. Speaker, there can be but one answer. At all times and under all circumstances in our northern climate wool is an indispensable article of daily consumption. It is shelter to the houseless, covering to the shivering, and fuel when the light of the fire is extinguished. The life of the workingman, the artisan, and the mechanic without the protection of woolen clothing would be insupportable while they toil, and their condition without it would be miserable indeed, after their daily toil is ended.

If these remarks be true ordinarily, how painfully true are they now. This has been a winter of unexampled severity. More than half a million of men are out of employment. In debt, without wages, strong men everywhere are seeing their families suffer because they can not get the work they are anxious to do.

Has this House of Representatives, to these sufferers, nothing more to say than this, that the necessaries of life to them shall be increased in expense? The very proposition is a mockery of their misfortune. The passage of this bill would be an unforgivable wrong to millions. It is not an auspicious time to make clothing dearer to the poor. If bounties are needed for any industry, in God's name take them out of your overflowing Treasury, not out of your suffering poor. [Applause.]

Secondly. What is the effect upon the manufacturer of the proposed legislation? That interest everywhere is in a state of depression. Many mill-owners have gone into insolvency. More have reduced the hours of labor. Many have shut up for a time. Few are running all the time and to the full extent of their capacity. In the midst of this embarrassment among the the wool manufacturers, does this House propose to add to their burden, by increasing the price of their raw materials?

One of the chief causes of the present depression is the high price of foreign wool. The duty even as it stands now under the present tariff, with the cost of importation added, increases the price of foreign wool to the American manufacturer nearly 60 per cent. above what it is at the port of shipment. In 1880 the American mills consumed 300,000,000 pounds of wool. Of these, 75,000,000 were imported. Nearly one-fourth of their consumption was of foreign production. They have the power in these mills to consume nearly twice as much as they do. To be able to manufacture to the extent of half of their capacity they have been obliged to import 75,000,000 pounds of foreign wool with the increase of price which the tariff makes. The mills of America can manufacture nearly 600,000,000 pounds annually. The wool-growers of America produce 300,000,000 pounds annually. Your high duty therefore disables your manufacturer from getting the wool he is required to have in order to supply deficiencies of home production. And by this very tariff, too, you have robbed these men of the markets of the world. England, with free wool, sells abroad one hundred and twenty million dollars' worth of woolen goods annually. America, with high duties on wool, sells abroad scarcely four hundred thousand dollars' worth. Pass this bill and increase the price of foreign wool, and you add to the embarrassment of every woolen manufacturer, you compel a further reduction of the wages of their operatives, and lock still more tightly against them the doors of the markets of the world.

Mr. Speaker, this wrong to the consumer, this wrong to the manufacturer is attempted to be justified on the ground that the American farmer will get a better price for his wool. This is a delusion. Who makes the market for the American farmer? No man buys wool and takes it to his own home to spin and weave it into clothes. It is the American manufacturer who makes the market for the American farmer. And just as he is prosperous or depressed is the price of wool high or low. [Applause.] It is natural that a man in prosperity will pay a better price than the man whom adversity has overtaken. And in this country to-day you find this astonishing situation—a high duty on foreign wool and a low price of American wool. And I charge here now that this low price of American wool is largely attributable to the high price of foreign wool.

There are three grades or classes of wool in the market: First, the superfine or the Silesian wool; second, the intermediary or combing wool; and, third, the coarse carpet wool. Of these America does not produce the superfine wool or the carpet wool, and it can not produce them. Therefore no duty on them can be of any benefit to the farmer of this country. He does not grow them.

As to the intermediary grade this is the situation: The wools of the foreign countries have a fiber and texture which our wools do not possess, and the American manufacturer needs them to mix with American wool to produce the best results. No man can make a good suit of clothes out of American wool alone. From England, from France, and other parts of the world we want their wool with its fiber to make the best product for our manufacturer in his work of supplying the home demand.

You see to-day, Mr. Speaker, that the whole supply of foreign wool is imported because of the necessity of manufacture. Let foreign wool come in free or let the duty be further reduced and you will bring in more foreign wool to commingle with the American wool to enable our manufacturers to make the best cloths. I believe every pound of foreign wool of intermediary grade that comes into this country makes more valuable every pound of wool raised here. The basis of my proposition on this point is that the foreign wool does not come into America in competition with American wool, but to supplement its deficiencies. This is no idle theory of mine. During the low duties on wool from 1847 to 1861 the farmers got on an average 5 cents per pound more for their wool than they have received from 1867 until now under the high protective tariff adopted in the year last named. In England when a proposition was made to take the duties off of wool altogether it was antagonized as calculated to destroy the wool-growing interests; but the result is that from that time until now the price of wool has steadily advanced, subject only to those fluctuations which affect all occupations.

In France we have the same result, for when the duty on wool was reduced from 33 to 22 per cent. wool immediately advanced 6 per cent. and continued at that rate. One of the principal statisticians of France reported to the French Government that "high duties on wool made low prices at home, while low duties on wool or free wool made good prices at home." In that report M. Baudrillard said, "The home" (French) "production is not sufficient for the daily wants of our industry. Every check thrown in the way of the latter affects its activity. As soon as our manufacturers can not procure foreign wool they decrease their production, because they can not find at home the required qualities, and the French wool which they would have used to mix in lies about in the markets."

Mr. Speaker, I believe if wool were put on the free-list to-day, with a corresponding reduction of the tariff on woolen goods, the result would be a large increase in manufacturing, a large addition to the number of operatives employed, an increase of at least 10 per cent. in the price of wool to the farmer, and a reduction of 25 per cent. in price to the people who have to purchase woolen clothes.

I know that I have been requested by the Democratic Legislature of the State of Ohio to vote to restore the duty on wool. I have a great respect for it as a body; I have a great respect for its individual members, so many of whom I know well and favorably. But I would not vote in this House to make woolen clothing dearer to the laboring population of this country if every Democrat in the State of Ohio should ask me to do so. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Woe to the party that proposes to obtain power by making the expense of living heavier and the struggle for existence still harder for those who can scarcely carry it on now. The path of victory to such a party is through the misfortunes and sufferings of their fellow-men. If lifted into power it will be on the shoulders of taxation and monopoly. The leaves of its laurel will be entwined with a poison vine which will cause them to wither even as they are being gathered.

For one I do not care that the party to which I belong shall come into power unless it shall be to give freer trade to our people, better investments to its capital, larger wages to its laborers, and greater glory to the American name on the high seas and among the nations of the earth.

[Here the hammer fell, and the gentleman resumed his seat amid great applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time for debate in opposition to the resolution has expired. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] is entitled to eight minutes remaining of his time in support of his resolution.

Mr. CONVERSE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York, in his handsome address the other day on the tariff, said that "some sheep farmers" had been before the Committee on Ways and Means. He denied that the farming interest had been there represented, and from his remarks one might infer that sheep-husbandry in the United States is an insignificant industry.

Mr. HENLEY. What gentleman from New York?

Mr. CONVERSE. I refer to Mr. COX. It may be worth while for the members of this House in the short fifteen minutes' debate allowed on each side to call to mind the magnitude and importance of this industry before they cast a vote which shall impair its value or leave it in a crippled condition, and which will make a difference of half a million votes in the results in the election next November. This is not a question, as asserted by my colleague [Mr. HURD], whether woolen clothing, which in his brilliant rhetoric serves as shelter, raiment, and food for the poor, shall command a higher price than it now does.

When the rates of duty on wool were reduced on the 3d of March, 1883, though the act did not take effect till the 30th day of June, the price of wool immediately went down, and the clip of 1883 was sold at 5 cents per pound less than it would have brought but for the reduction of the rate of duty. It is a singular commercial fact that although the reduction of duty was only 3½ cents per pound, yet from increased importations overstocking the market, or from the pressure of a declining market or other unknown cause, the price in the open market was reduced 5 cents per pound. The farmers of the country lost in the transaction not less than $15,000,000, of which sum Ohio lost $1,100,000. Has there been any corresponding reduction in clothing? Have the poor of the United States benefited by the transaction? The facts and figures on this point should have been presented by my colleague. They do not sustain his rhetoric. There has been no reduction in the price of clothing; if there has been any change the price has increased.

The real question is, whether this great industry shall be kept in the hands of American citizens or whether its profits shall be divided with foreign nations. [Applause.] Shall Americans who support the Government, bear its burdens, and fight its battles also control its markets and regulate them by home competition, or shall that control be shared with others, who neither support the Government, bear any of its burdens, or fight any of its battles, unless they fight against us? That is the question.

Sheep-husbandry is one of the largest, if not the largest, single productive industry in the United States. Recent statements of the statistician in the Agricultural Department show 1,020,728 flocks of sheep in the United States, exclusive of those on public-land ranches, as follows:

The value of those flocks exceeds $250,000,000, and if the value of the lands used in the prosecution of this industry should be added, it would aggregate as large an investment as any productive industry in the United States. The annual product of wool and mutton exceeds $150,000,000, the most of which is the representative of labor expended in its production during the current year. The annual product of wool in the United States is now 320,000,000 pounds, worth above $100,000,000, and 12,000,000 sheep are slaughtered annually for food, worth $50,000,000. Sheep-husbandry furnishes employment to more men than any other single industry in the United States. It would be a low estimate to say that each flock on an average furnishes employment for two men during a considerable portion of the year. That would make 2,041,456 men, not counting those on the public-land ranches. What other single industry requires or employs half that number? Women and children and diseased or aged men and cripples can not fill the places in sheep-husbandry they can in factories. Strong, active, healthy men are required in the heat of summer to plow the ground, plant and cultivate the corn, cut the hay, prepare the fodder for winter use, and in winter's cold to follow and feed and shelter the flocks through snow and sleet and storm. For washing, shearing, marketing the wool, paring hoofs, caring for the lambs, and herding through the summer the same vigorous, healthy, and self-reliant class of laborers is required.

The 93,984 flocks in Ohio consume annually not less than 2,000,000 bushels of corn, to say nothing of rough feed. By the process of feeding we compress into the 25,000,000 pounds of wool annually produced in that State not less than 2,000,000 bushels of corn and thousands of tons of coarse feed—hay, corn fodder, summer and fall grass—and sell them thus in convenient form for inexpensive shipment. There were entered upon the grand duplicate for taxation in Ohio last year 5,130,920 sheep, valued also for taxation at $13,249,166. Large numbers of sheep are stall-fed and fattened through the winter on corn, as we fatten our hogs and cattle, and find a ready market for mutton in the spring.

The farmer thus provides extensive employment for labor, and can pay fair wages if more labor is required than he and his sons can perform. He finds a market at home for much that would not bear transportation, and in addition saves the waste to enrich his lands or restore to fertility the fields that have been impoverished by continuous cultivation, and may occupy profitably hill lands which can not be cultivated and lands poorly watered which for that reason are unsuited to other stock. It is believed that there is no single domestic productive industry in the United States which surpasses in magnitude and importance or confers more blessings upon the nation that fosters it than sheep-husbandry.

The gentleman [Mr. HURD] tells us that the duty on imported wool increases the price of clothing to the poor and distressed, and argues against the inhumanity of such a course, and advocates placing wool on the free-list. In the same breath he reminds us of the fact that wool was higher in price in the United States from 1847 to 1861, when the duties were low—merely nominal—than it was afterward when the rate was increased. He tells us also that on some occasion in France when the duty on wool was reduced from 33 to 22 per cent. wool advanced 6 per cent. and continued at that advanced price, and that the same results were observed in England on a similar occasion. He reaches the climax of his argument when he tells us that if wool were placed on the free-list in the United States it would result in an increase of at least 10 per cent. in the price of wool on the farm. One part of his argument thoroughly refutes and destroys the other part of it. The two are utterly inconsistent with each other.

The explanation of the historic facts in England, France, and the United States mentioned by my colleague is easily made. When the duty on wool is low or when wool is on the free-list home production declines, and as soon as the foreign producer or the trader finds that he has control of the market he advances the price, and large profits accrue to both the foreign producer and the trader. This is not only true of wool, but is equally true when applied to every other domestic production which from its nature can be the subject of foreign competition.

Since the establishment of the wool tariff in 1867 the price of wool in the United States has steadily declined by reason of the increased production and home competition.

The following statistics will show the number of sheep in the United States and the quantity of wool produced during the years stated:

| Census years. | Sheep. | Wool. |
|---|---|---|
| | Number. | Pounds. |
| 1850 | 21,723,220 | 52,516,559 |
| 1860 | 22,471,225 | 60,264,913 |
| 1870 | 28,477,951 | 100,102,387 |
| 1880 | 43,576,899 | 235,648,834 |
| 1883 (agricultural statistics) | 50,500,000 | 320,000,000 |

The price of wool on the farm at the close of the war was about 80 cents per pound. Now it is 35 cents per pound for washed wool. The first duty imposed on imported wool was in 1825, and fixed at 20 per cent. ad valorem, which the succeeding year was increased to 30 per cent. In 1828 the duty on wool costing 10 cents per pound and over was fixed at 4 cents per pound and 40 per cent. ad valorem. In 1829 the ad valorem duty was increased 5 per cent. and in 1830 an additional 5 per cent., making in all 50 per cent. ad valorem duty and 4 cents per pound. In 1832 wool costing 8 cents or less per pound was admitted free, and wool costing above 8 cents per pound paid a duty of 4 cents per pound and 40 per cent. ad valorem. In 1842 that costing 7 cents a pound or less paid 5 per cent. duty, and that costing above 7 cents per pound paid 3 cents per pound and 30 per cent. ad valorem. In 1846 the specific duty was abolished, and in 1847 the ad valorem duty on higher grade was fixed at 24 per cent. In 1857 wool costing 20 cents per pound or less was admitted free. In 1861 wool costing 18 cents per pound or less, 5 per cent.; that costing from 18 to 24 cents per pound, 3 cents per pound; and that costing over 24 cents paid 9 cents per pound. In 1864 that costing 12 cents or less per pound paid 3 cents per pound; between 12 and 24 cents, 6 cents per pound. That costing between 24 and 32 cents paid 10 cents per pound and 10 per cent. ad valorem; and all costing above 32 cents per pound paid 12 cents a pound and 10 per cent. ad valorem. The act of 1867 divided imported wools into three classes, namely, clothing, combing, and carpet wools. Unwashed wools of the first and second class of the value of 32 cents or less per pound at the place from whence shipped paid a duty of 10 cents per pound and 11 per cent. ad valorem; that exceeding 32 cents in value, 12 cents per pound and 10 per cent. ad valorem. Wools of the third class valued at 12 cents or less paid 3 cents a pound duty, and that valued above 12 cents paid 6 cents per pound. Washed wools paid double and scoured three times the respective amounts.

A comparison of these enactments with the rate of increase in the number of sheep and the production per head will show the dependence of one upon the other and the motives which induced the flockmasters of the country to go to the enormous expense required to obtain the best strains of blood for breeding purposes, thus securing the best quality and largest yield of wool; and also induced them at immense cost to arrange their farms and construct buildings and appliances suitable to the care and feeding of their flocks in summer and winter, all of which must be sacrificed in the destruction of this industry by legislation.

What would be the effect of the gentleman's proposition to place wool on the free-list? The first effect for a few years would be to cheapen the wool until our farmers would abandon an unprofitable business and thus diminish the quantity of the product, and as soon as the foreign producer or the shipper found himself in control of our wool market he would advance the price far above present rates, and we could not help ourselves except by restoring the duty on imported wool and thus slowly through a long process of years developing again this industry. In case of war the price would go up to a dollar a pound, as it did in the late war of the rebellion, or $2 a pound, as it did in the war of 1812. Wool is as necessary an article in war as gunpowder or fire-arms. Of the two, the manufacture of arms could be more safely abandoned as a precautionary measure of self-defense than the production of wool, because it could be more quickly resumed in an emergency. A single year of war with the wool product in the hands of a foreign enemy, besides endangering our success and subjecting both soldiers and citizens to great suffering and loss of life, would cost us many hundred millions of dollars. It would be far more serious and expensive than the confederate cruisers built and manned by England to prey upon our commerce on the high seas.

Another effect of placing wool upon the free-list would be, even if prices are not unduly advanced, to draw from us annually one hundred and fifty millions of coin with which to pay for the wool, thus draining the country of its precious metals. Reciprocity as presented by free-traders is a delusion. We could not pay this sum by increased sales of some other home production to the parties from whom we purchase the imported wool. Europe will never under any circumstances buy more provisions than she needs, and will always buy what she needs and where she can buy cheapest. Trade is always between individuals and never between nations. The commercial statistics of all countries will show that purchases and sales are not made in the same country by the people of any other. There is no such thing as sentiment or friendship either national or personal in trade. Men engaged in foreign trade buy where they can buy cheapest and buy that which their customers demand, and which they can sell again, without regard to the balance of trade.

The next effect of placing wool on the free-list would be to deprive our countrymen, who, the gentleman says, are now in large numbers idle, though seeking work, of the industry and employment given to 2,000,000 men, and which contributes to the aggregate wealth of the Republic at least $150,000,000 per year, and would give an equal amount of patronage, employment, and profit to foreign nations.

My colleague quotes, as did the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cox], England—that robber nation of the earth—as an example for us to follow, whose laboring poor are neither fed, clothed, housed, nor educated as ours are. He says England sells one hundred and twenty millions of dollars' worth of woolen fabrics annually. Note the distinction and difference to the people between selling one hundred and twenty millions' worth of manufactured goods and the production of one hundred and fifty million dollars' worth of wool and mutton. The one is the product of the spindle and the power-loom, the other the product of human labor, in every State and Territory of this Union and in every county of many of the States.

Why, sir, do not those gentlemen know—does not every man within the sound of my voice know—that American free trade means British protection? [Renewed applause.] American free trade is British protection. Does not everbody know that when you cut down the tariff on wool you put just so much more money into the pockets of the Britishers in Australia. [Continued applause.]

My colleague [Mr. HURD] is misinformed and entirely mistaken when he talks about the superior fiber in the Australian wool, and says that a good suit of clothes can not be made from American wool. This will be news to American wool-growers, who through all these years required to build up the industry supposed otherwise. There is one variety of long, fine fiber grown in Australia which is not produced in the United States in sufficient quantities to supply a sudden demand occasioned by change of style, but which American wool-growers will agree to produce in any desired quantity within three years if the duty is restored.

They are able to do it, because they have as a basis for crossing an abundance of the best merino blood in the world, and can quickly produce almost any desired quality of wool and in sufficient quantity to supply the demand.

The Ohio wool, which denotes a particular grade of wool rather than the place were it is raised, has no superior for fineness, strength, evenness, and elasticity of fiber. Even the Australian wool does not possess these qualities in such perfection, nor can they be produced anywhere except by feeding corn or other grain when pastures begin to fail. The experiment has been tried of shipping from Ohio flocks of the best blood, producing this best quality of wool, to the western plains, where it was found that the same identical sheep produced an uneven, soft, brittle or mushy fiber, and altogether an inferior quality of wool to that produced by them in Ohio. Different causes have been assigned for this curious fact. Some assign drought, others alkali, as the cause; but to me the most reasonable is the absence of grain to supply deficiency in pasture, keep up the regular animal heat, and an even condition of flesh and strength required for the regular and even growth of the fiber. The Ohio wool furnishes the staple for the worsted in the United States, and is extensively used to mix with inferior and less expensive wool to improve the quality of the cloth to be produced. This variety is grown mainly in Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, and Wisconsin, but more attention is paid to breeding in Vermont than in any other State.

The gentleman [Mr. HURD] has substantially admitted the fact, and it is a fact whether he admitted or not, that under the influence of a reasonable and moderate protection to this industry from foreign competition, though never less than 34,000,000 pounds of foreign wool came in under it every year, the price steadily declined in the United States, and that the same thing occurred in England and France. He admits the price will advance when wool is placed on the free-list. Why, then, should not the duty be restored and our people permitted to enjoy the luxury of cheap wool produced at home rather than high-priced wool produced abroad? The increased production and home competition accomplish the result. His theory about mixing wools on account of the inferiority of American wool, on which he bases his whole argument, is wholly and absolutely false, and his conclusions are therefore of no value.

The question is not alone whether we shall have cheap wool and cheaper clothing, but shall we preserve this industry to our own people by enabling them to control our own markets, retain in the United States the profits of this industry, restore the richness and fertility of our fields exhausted by continuous grain-growing keep within our own borders and our own control this article of prime necessity in war, add a hundred and fifty millions to the annual increase of wealth in the Republic, furnish remunerative employment to more than 2,000,000 laborers, consume on the farm coarse food that would otherwise go to waste, and promote diversity of industry and employment. The people are more contented and happy when there is an abundance of employment, when employment seeks the man instead of the man seeking the employment. The chief capital stock in the United States consists of the skill and ability of our people to work, and when they are idle by reason of giving our employment to foreign nations our capital stock is being wasted. The month, week, or day that is not used is lost beyond recall. The $1,100,000 loss on the price of wool in Ohio last year and the $15,000,000 loss in the United States by the act of March 3, 1883, did not diminish the price of clothing one particle. Somebody received the benefit of that loss to the farmers. It was either the British wool-growers of Australia or the woolen manufacturers of New England, or possibly it was divided between them.

My colleague refers with much feeling and tenderness to the embarrassed condition of the 20,000 manufacturers of woolens, which he says is the result of the present high duty on wool. Why should they be embarrassed? The act of March 3, 1883, increased the tariff on woolens 2.19 per cent., as the importations under it show, while it reduced the duty on wools, on an average, 18 per cent. and on some varieties 25 per cent. I saw in the newspapers not long ago that certain of the New England woolen mills in January, 1884, declared annual dividends ranging from 20 to 24 per cent. on investment. The wool-growers do not realize above 3 per cent. on their investment after deducting the value of labor. I can not see why the woolen manufacturers should be embarrassed, unless it be the embarrassment of wealth. Shall we see the free-traders and the manufacturers co-operating and voting together to defeat this bill? If so, the manufacturers can not complain if the farmers should afterward combine in like manner to fix the duty on woolens. But the farmers do not desire to embarrass any other industry. All they desire is that foreigners, who contribute nothing to the support of our Government, shall not be permitted to come in untaxed, without paying a license fee therefor, and undersell them and destroy or cripple their industry.

The profits of the wool industry were barely remunerative under the old law, and had long since found a common level with the other industries in the United States. The freedom and ease with which men in this country change their employment render it impossible for any one industry to enjoy for any great length of time profits above the average of other industries unless protected by some patent right. So soon as one industry becomes more profitable than the rest enterprising men flock to it till competition restores it to the common level. So that those who sell their own services, according to the American standard of prices, ought not to complain, but ought to be willing to pay for what they are compelled to buy according to the same standard. I see no hardship in that.

The million of flockmasters, an equal number of employés, indeed all who are familiar with the subject, say the duty of 1867 must be restored or equivalent legislation had or the destruction of this great industry becomes an accomplished fact. More petitions for this restoration and remonstrating against the passage of the Morrison tariff bill, which reduces the duty on wool still lower, have been sent to this Congress than upon all other subjects of general legislation put together. They are plain, honest, truthful men, who seek no advantage, want none, who understand their own business and its necessities, and with one voice they demand relief at the hands of an American Congress, in which Democrats, who have always professed friendship and sympathy for the farmer, have the majority. There can be no question about their needing the relief. Although Australia, a British province, can not produce as good a quality of wool as ours, yet it can be used in place of ours. Australia has perennial pastures. The British Government, with an eye to the control of the wool business of the world, rents a hundred square miles for a hundred dollars per year for sheep culture. Our lands are high priced and expensive. Australia has 80,000,000 of sheep, with only 3,000,000 of people, in a territory of 3,000,000 square miles (about as large as the United States), while we have 50,500,000 sheep and above 50,000,000 of people.

There are but few items on which the farmer can be practically benefited by duty on imports, while this numerous class purchase and consume the products of all other protected industries. Can this Congress afford to deny this relief? A Republican President recommended a reduction of rate of duty on wool. A Republican Congress did it. Can a Democratic Congress refuse to restore it? These very men who are knocking at the door of Congress for relief have the power to elect the next Congress and can elect or defeat any candidate for President. I have no doubt they will exercise that power. They gave us Ohio last year on the pledge from the stump all over the State that we would make an honest effort to restore the duty on wool. The Legislature of that State, largely Democratic in both branches, by a unanimous vote instructed their Senators and requested their Representatives in Congress to support the measure for the restoration of the tariff of 1867 on wool. My colleague [Mr. HURD] says he would not do so if every Democrat in the State should ask him to do it.

In 1882 and 1883, in both of which years the Democratic party in Ohio were successful, the Democracy favored the adjustment of the tariff so as to encourage productive home industries and afford labor a suitable reward. The tariff act of 1883 does not encourage the wool industry; the act of 1867 did encourage it, though there was never less than 34,000,000 imported under it. This, sir, is a representative government, and the voice of the constituent ought to be heard and respected in this Hall. For one I expect to stand by the farmers in this country and so far as in my power promote their interests. They are patient, unambitious, industrious, saving, honest, virtuous, and fearless. They constitute the greatest strength of the Government, the foundation of its prosperity, pay its taxes and fight its battles. They do not now and never will ask anything that is unjust to any class of our citizens, and whatever they do ask ought to be conceded ungrudgingly on all sides.

The theory of free trade is contrary to the settled policy of this Government from its organization to the present time and the theory of free and cheap raw materials is founded on a fallacy. What are denominated raw materials can not be produced by automatic machinery, but are mainly the product of human labor and human skill; therefore as you cheapen the material you must cheapen the labor that produces it. Cheapening the labor tends to degradation, ignorance, and slavery, which is the cheapest form of labor in the world. But when the price of the raw material approximates as nearly as possible the price of the finished product, then human labor becomes more valuable. The laborer is elevated and free to control his own actions. He works where he can receive the greatest reward, changes his occupation or employer at will, educates his children, wears better clothes, lives in better houses, and eats better food. Man becomes more valuable than the machine. His services command more of the common products of capital and labor, and civilization assumes its highest form.

The SPEAKER. The time allowed for debate on this question has expired. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] to discharge the Committee on Ways and Means from the further consideration of the bill read at the desk and pass the same.

Mr. SPRINGER. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 119, nays 126, not voting 77: as follows:

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the motion of Mr. CONVERSE was not agreed to.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. HARDEMAN said: I am paired on this question with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ELLIOTT]——

The SPEAKER. The rules require that pairs be reduced to writing and announced from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. HARDEMAN. A statement of this pair has been handed in writing to the Clerk; but I wish to say that on this question the gentleman from Pennsylvania would vote in the affirmative and I in the negative.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. Mr. Speaker, I am paired on this question with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN]. I wish to state that if he were present, he would vote in the affirmative and I in the negative.

Mr. FIEDLER. My colleague [Mr. FERRELL] was called away by sickness, but expected to be here to-day. As he has not returned I fear he is still detained by the same cause. I have no doubt that if present he would vote "ay."

Mr. WASHBURN. I am paired with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND]. On this question I presume he would vote in the negative. If not paired, I should vote in the affirmative.

The following additional pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk:

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire, with Mr. DINGLEY, until further notice.

Mr. FORAN with Mr. G. D. WISE, on the wool bill.

Mr. BELMONT with Mr. FERRELL, on this vote.

Mr. FOLLETT with Mr. COLLINS, on the wool bill. Mr. FOLLETT would vote "ay" and Mr. COLLINS "no."

Mr. FINERTY with Mr. ROBINSON of New York.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, with Mr. STEELE. Mr. HEWITT would vote "no" and Mr. STEELE "ay."

Mr. BUDD with Mr. MCCOID, until further notice.

Mr. ELLIS with Mr. KELLOGG, for this day.

Mr. LAMB with Mr. SLOCUM, on the bill to restore duty on wool. Mr. LAMB would vote "ay" and Mr. SLOCUM "no."

Mr. HARDEMAN with Mr. ELLIOTT, on the wool and tariff questions.

Mr. SENEY with Mr. OATES, on the wool bill. Mr. SENEY would vote "ay" and Mr. OATES "no."

Mr. GEDDES with Mr. VAN EATON, on the wool bill. Mr. GEDDES would vote "ay" and Mr. VAN EATON "no."

Mr. HISCOCK with Mr. BLACKBURN, on the wool bill. Mr. HISCOCK would vote "ay" and Mr. BLACKBURN "no."

The vote was then announced as above recorded. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

RED LAKE INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. NELSON. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill in relation to the Red Lake Indian reservation, in the State of Minnesota.

Whereas the said reservation contains upward of 3,000,000 acres of land, whereof about one-third is tillable land, and is occupied by less than 1,200 Indians, who have not to exceed 600 acres thereof under cultivation; and

Whereas nearly all the lands of the United States in said State suitable for agriculture, and not included in any Indian reservation, have already been disposed of, and there is a great demand among the people of said State that the Indian title to said reservation be extinguished, that suitable provision be made for the Indians by allotments in severalty and otherwise, and that the lands not required for such allotments be disposed of to actual settlers under the homestead laws of the United States: Therefore,
